Hoover.

Philadelphia is planning a great exposition in celebration of the sesqui-centennial—in plain English, the one hundred-and-fiftieth—anniversary of American independence. The project has gotten to a point where Mr. Herbert Hoover has been asked to assume the general directorship. The enterprise is projected upon a scale designed to outclass all preceding efforts in the exposition line, not so much in physical magnitude as in detailed excellence. Mr. Hoover has not yet either accepted or declined, but the general opinion at Washington is that he will remain in his present post. It has not been his way to leave any task half done; and there is, in his proposals for development of the Department of Commerce, a vast work yet to be achieved.

More interesting in themselves, as relating to Mr. Hoover, are projects looking to the rejuvenation of Russia and the reorganization of China. These two countries, each with a vast population and with enormous potentialities, are in chaos. There are those who despair of any wholesome outcome in either case unless there shall be brought to bear outside resources and outside leadership. It is suggested that Mr. Hoover is the one man qualified by ability, repute, and experience to represent the Western world in a systematic effort to establish orderly government in either or both of these distracted countries. Twenty years ago Mr. Hoover achieved a great engineering and administrative success in China—a success so striking as to establish a reputation in that country unmatched by any other in the outer world. By a curious sequence of circumstances he practically duplicated his Chinese record in Russia. His more recent career has emphasized his prestige in both China and Russia. There are those who believe that in either of these countries the magic of his name supplemented by resources and powers he might bring into operation would be sufficient to stay the tides of anarchy which threaten a destruction unparalleled in human history.

Noting these more or less vague calls upon Mr. Hoover, a Washington correspondent remarks that "there is hardly a colossal job anywhere on God's footstool that sooner or later does not yearn for the master hand of Herbert Hoover." All of which goes to demonstrate that master hands are rare at all times, and never more rare than in the present era. The world has in abundance men of talent, men of energy, men of force, men of initiative, men of character. But now as always the combination of powers that make for leadership in the largest measure are so rare as usually to be non-existent. We question the qualification of any man to do for China and Russia what needs to be done for their salvation. It is from within rather than from without that regeneration must come. As Rome found her Caesar, as France found her Napoleon, and as America found her Washington, so much China and Russia find the personalities who symbolize their fundamental ideas and aspirations and become by mastery of innate forces the masters of circumstance.

The United States Senate.

The elements were a good deal mixed in Boies Penrose. He was a man of large brain, of solid acquisitions, of intense vital energies, and of very exceptional gifts of foresight and resolution. He had the background of a fine family connection, and in his youth the advantages of careful breeding and social experience. Something of dignity he gained from the fact that his three brothers, while their names appeared less often than his own in newspaper headlines, were not less able and distinguished than himself. Choosing politics as a career, Penrose lost something on moral account. In a business sense he was strictly honest, but when it came to politics he was less scrupulous. Whatever was essential to success—and the whole world knows how success in Pennsylvania has been gained for many years—Penrose practiced with scant regard for the moralities. He viewed politics as a game, and he played it unrestrained, without qualms of any sort. He played to win, and he did win because he brought to bear upon the game a vision and an energy that outmatched all rivalry. As a senator of the United States he was first a politician, but incidentally he was a profound statesman. No man in the Senate since the retirement of Spooner and Root has equaled Penrose in judgment, in personal force, in the combination of powers that make for domination. If not always on the right side of things, he was as nearly right as a man who puts political calculation before every other consideration can ever be. Taken by and large Penrose in recent years has been the most effective figure in the senatorial group. His name stands associated with the soundest proposals that have come before that body. He has been a powerful opponent of many vicious legislative proposals. Yet so regardless was he of certain conventional sensibilities that in recent years he has been something of a burden to his party. Pretty much always right in relation to matters of legislation, amazingly wise—albeit a bit sinister—in his political philosophy, his methods of procedure were so abrupt, so arbitrary, so lacking the grace of conciliation, as to weaken the effect of his efforts and to create an atmosphere of distrust and discredit. Those who have admired Mr. Penrose in very many respects—the Argonaut among them—have often had occasion to grieve that his great abilities were not sustained by a larger measure of conventional discretion. He achieved much, but he might have achieved vastly more if, in addition to his extraordinary intellectual powers, there had been added the powers that lie in finely poised moral restraint.

The methods by which Penrose gained and sustained his prestige in Pennsylvania politics—and to a degree in the wider sphere of national politics—have gone out of fashion. Penrose was the last of the all-powerful state "bosses." No other man now holds the political forces of a great state in the hollow of his hand. Nowhere now would it be possible for any man to establish himself in the kind of authority that Penrose had in Pennsylvania. Even in Pennsylvania no new man may now attain the powers that more than half a century ago were won by old Simon Cameron and which have descended from one "boss" to another until now. Penrose was the last as he was the strongest of them all. So much has been said—and for the most part truly said—in condemnation of the "boss" system of politics that the newer generation has been led to regard it as a historic nightmare of political depravity. The indictment is too broad. Something may be said for a system that worked out a fairly efficient administration of public affairs and at a cost to taxpayers far below present standards of public expenditure. The vice of the system was in the fact that it was in principle directly antagonistic to the fundamental idea of the American system. It was destructive of that personal attitude towards public affairs that is the moral obligation of every citizen if the common standards of liberty, with government of the people by the people, are to be sustained. Those who sought to justify the "boss" system—and there are those who still regard it as the best of practical political methods—make the moral mistake of valuing efficiency above liberty.

The death of Penrose leaves Lodge of Massachusetts as the outstanding member of the majority group. Lodge has nominally held the post of party leader since the Republicans resumed control of the Senate. But the leadership, so far as there has been any, has been that of Penrose, based upon a dominating mentality and sheer weight of personal force. While Lodge is not a man to be taken lightly, it is further true that he is not a man to be taken in the full measure of his pretensions. More may be said of him on the score of his traditional background rather than of his native powers. His is a case in which inherited position and a high degree of cultivation out-balance the native quality of the man. In his personal character he illustrates that particular quality of the New Englander which somehow contrives to win admiration even as it repels affection. There is in the man a lack of temperamental warmth; and by the same token there is not in him enough of intellectual weight to compensate for the deficiency. Nobody ever had for Lodge the sentiment expressed by Roosevelt for Penrose—"a sneaking regard for the old ruffian." Lodge is no ruffian, nor has he the basis for winning a sneaking or any other species of warm feeling. As majority leader during the past several months he has not succeeded in winning a loyal following. The rise of the agricultural bloc, with the action of many majority members in the matter of legislation relative to the tariff and to taxation, go to illustrate Lodge's failure to hold men, even to accepted obligations. The short of it all is that Mr. Lodge, while a man of many merits, lacks the powers that are essential in a highly influential senatorial figure.

In many ways the most portentous figure in the Senate today is Smoot of Utah. In the man there is something of Lincolnian suggestion; and if he is without the spiritual quality that distinguished Lincoln above all men in his day or of any day in American politics, he has what Lincoln lacked—a highly instructed and a definitely trained mind. He has, too, the powers that depend upon a sound understanding exercised in systematic industry. No member of the Senate works harder than Smoot. None brings to whatever subject to which his attention is addressed a more definite intelligence or a more open mind. Smoot is very definitely a partisan, but it is not in partisan spirit that he goes about the work of legislation. He is a thinker and at the same time he is what may be called an actionist. He knows how to transmute abstract thinking into the concrete of legislative projects. He has the ability to set forth his views impressively. He has the personal qualities that command coöperation and loyalty. On the whole Mr. Smoot, we believe, is in his combination of qualities and powers the most effective figure in the Senate. He came to the Senate under the cloud that attached, and to some extent still attaches, to the "twin relic of barbarism" that still lurks in the back counties of Utah. He had, or was reported to have, three wives—and the fact, if it was a fact, told strongly against him in his earlier career. Now that phase of his background seems so nearly forgotten that it is rarely mentioned. He has won his place in the Senate, and a high repute with the country, by exercise of qualities of industry, loyalty to principle, faithfulness to personal and party obligations, and in the modest play of social qualities that command consideration and respect among men.

On the purely intellectual side of things Borah of Idaho is probably the strongest figure in the Senate. His mind is both keen and powerful. He has exceptional capabilities of address, he has courage, and he has industry. The country is vastly indebted to him for his timely protest against the Wilsonian league of nations; and to him as much as to any other man, unless it be President Harding himself, is due the movement that brought about the pending Washington Conference. The fatal defect of Mr. Borah's senatorial character is his lack of the coöperative spirit. In the argot of his own dear Idaho, he is very much of an "off-ox." His bias is that of opposition. His instinctive attitude towards pretty much every proposal is fiercely on the negative side. Fierceness is his habit; and it is due to him to add that fearlessness is likewise his habit. He is never to be led blindly; nor may he ever be driven. On the score of sheer intellectuality Borah ought to be a leader in the Senate. He is heard with attention whenever he speaks, for he always speaks well; and there is in his utterances the force of personal conviction. But he is not destined to a larger place than he now holds; indeed it is not likely that he will again attain the height of personal prestige illustrated in his work with respect to the league of nations. His status in the Senate and outside of it as a cantankerous irreconcilable has become so fixed that it is not likely that he will ever be able to change it. Nothing short of a great crisis, powerful enough in its moral appeal to win him over to the constructive attitude of mind, could serve to reestablish him in the consideration of many who once looked upon him as a prospective President.

Taken by and large the Senate has distinctly deteriorated in recent years. Today there is not among its members anybody who measures up to the standards of the period when senators were chosen by legislative election. If under the old rule many unqualified men came to the Senate, there also came many strong personalities. Under the system of popular election choice almost invariably falls, not upon the strong man, but upon some man of the conciliatory type. It is the professional "glad-hander," the man who is so weak at the point of conviction and courage as to be all things to all men, who wins by popular vote. The modern primary system is another cause of weakness in senatorial membership. Few men or none at all of the old senatorial type are willing to go forth, cap in hand, to seek the office or to take on the labors of two protracted and onerous campaigns. The tendency is away from the old standards of individual strength. More and more, preferment falls to self-seekers of "smooth" temperament and habit. It will be long before we see a new race of Websters, Clays, Blaines, Spooners, and Roots. There has come a day of the relatively small man in the Senate of the United States.

The Issue of Ireland.

As we write on Wednesday the Dail Eireann after a recess of several days is again considering the proposed Irish settlement. Indications are favorable for its acceptance, despite the protests of De Valera and his associated corps of professional agitators. Griffith, head of the Sinn Fein, is for it, as are other leaders of the Sinn Fein Association. The Pope has given it a mild form of blessing and the local clergy are largely enlisted in its behalf. It will probably go through, though there is little prospect that it will put a stop to the old contentions. It will be accepted, not as a finality, but as a step toward the complete independence which remains in many minds as a cherished ideal. Although it will not make for definite peace, it can hardly fail to help the situation by minimizing grievances, real or imaginary. Ireland as a free dominion will hardly make effective appeal to sentiment or to passion. It is now pretty definitely understood that Ulster will not come in; and here again trouble is likely to arise. Two of the counties of Ulster are predominantly Catholic. They will wish to enter the new dominion, but their associates of Ulster will not willingly consent to their being lopped off. Obviously—even though the Dail Eireann may accept the dominion settlement—the end of the Irish problem is not yet.

The Conference.

There are indications of weariness both inside and outside the Conference hall. Under the strain of minor considerations the "pep" with which the Conference started has to a considerable degree evaporated. Some of the commissioners have gone home; all would like to go. Technical experts and official advisers with nothing to do are finding time heavy on their hands. Even the attendant journalists, presumed to be proof against ennui, find it difficult to flog up their jaded spirits. It is clearly time when President Harding and Secretary Hughes should recall their own warning at the beginning and not attempt too much.

Achievements to date have been beyond what anybody had reason to expect. They involve nullification of the ruinous competitive race in naval armaments, parity of the American and British naval armaments, nullification of the Anglo-Japanese alliance, protection of China against external aggression, drafting of the Four-Power agreement which (if accepted by the United States Senate) will at the very least assure respite of war-talk in the Pacific. These are great achievements. In themselves they are sufficient, not only to justify the Conference, but to distinguish it as a definite forward step in human progress.

Even more significant than these concrete achievements are the "imponderables" growing out of the meeting and tending to better permanent international relations. A new and better fashion has been established in international diplomacy. The conference principle as distinct from the old system of secret deals has been established and made the rule among order-loving nations of the world. The overwrought imperialistic ideas of Japan have been checked. America and Britain have been brought to comprehend the wisdom of sympathetic association and of coöperative action; and thereby a step has been taken toward that unity of the English-speaking world that has long been a cherished ideal. France, if her statesmen shall upon sober thought have the sense to comprehend it, has gained a large measure of moral assurance tending to her protection.

All this being so, it would seem a good time to quit—to refer to a future conference or conferences the half-dozen or more matters that remain undetermined. There is danger in a long-drawn-out attempt to sweep the table clean—danger that advantages definitely won may be lost in petty differences and in trivial contentions. Further effort concerning matters, and along lines, calculated to affect the nations not represented in this Conference would better be postponed until they have been brought into the Conference circle. There can be no final or even relatively final settlement of many things until Germany and Russia shall have adjusted themselves to the new order of things, reestablished international connections and thereby qualified to join the group about the Conference table. There will be no settlement of many international issues until all nations of magnitude shall have a share in bringing about adjustments. To proceed to reorganize the world while half of it is in chaos would be measurably paralleling the blunder of Versailles. Better now leave some things undone than to risk the raising of irritations and contentions tending to make future agreements difficult. A good time to quit is when the quitting is good.

Senators Borah, Reed, La Follette, and Watson are whetting their snickersnees in preparation for attacking the Four-Power treaty when it shall come before the Senate for ratification. They will attempt to duplicate the record as related to the league of nations. But there is no fair parallel between the two projects. The one bound the United States to coöperate in an artificial and quixotic project to the degree of a pledge to provide armed force to serve under alien direction. The Four-Power treaty merely pledges the United States to confer with the governments of Britain, Japan, and France in cases where there may arise differences of opinion or innovations in policy. No sympathy worthy of notice has been accorded the Borah-Reed group. The treaty will be accepted, and by a substantial vote. Incidentally, it is gratifying to observe that the partisans of Mr. Wilson are not proposing anything in the way of organized opposition. At an earlier date it was suggested that Mr. Wilson's influence would be exerted against any treaty coming out of the Conference, in a spirit of revenge on the score of his own disappointment. There are no indications of such an effort on his part. He has taken no public part in relation to the pending issue and apparently will make no attempt to obstruct Mr. Harding's plans.

Editorial Notes.

It is pertinent to inquire in what measure American charity exercised in relief of suffering in Russia tends to support the political régime that has brought about famine, pestilence, and starvation. It strikes harshly upon the sympathetic spirit to learn that the Soviet army and navy total 1,595,000 men and that the plans of Soviet War Minister Trotsky look to increasing this force and equipping it for active operations this coming season. It would seem that a country able to organize and maintain an army and navy of upwards of a million and a half men should be able to feed its own people. One can but wonder if in sending shiploads of food and clothing to Russia we are not in effect adding to the resources of Lenin and Trotsky by permitting them practically to devote to war expenditure means that would otherwise go to relief of poverty.

No doubt the Orient "lies wide open," as reported by the excursionists who returned last week from a tour along the east front of Asia. But a great commerce with the Orient is not to be achieved lightly. It will take something more serious than holiday excursions to turn the trick. If we are going to deal extensively with China, our manufacturers and merchants must first study the needs of that country. There must be established banking facilities both at home and in the Orient. There must be strongly organized and regularly sustained agencies of transportation. The door of the Orient may indeed be open, but effective entrance to it is sober business and is hardly practicable of achievement by holiday enthusiasm and journalistic drum-beating.

A headline some weeks ago asked "Why do women love bad men?" with reference to the scores of love letters and proposals that Landru received while in prison. French thespians of the gentle sex have been Landru's most ardent defenders, but women the world over seem to have been keenly interested in Landru's miserable history. The various news services of the country say that they were deluged by offers to report the trial from amateur women journalists. Landru himself was back of all this. In addition to an uncanny knowledge of law he seems to possess an uncanny knowledge of psychology. Only, unhappily for him, his astuteness worked too well. His knowledge has been his own undoing. Too much knowledge is a dangerous thing in the moral of the Landru case. An infatuated French comedienne called him "the world's most magnificent lover." For some peculiar reason known only, if at all, to feminine minds Landru posed as a lover and got away with it. And whether all the world loves a lover or not, all women seem to do so. This, we contend, was Landru's first line of defense. He counted on being cleared by popular opinion—feminine opinion. And not being much of a man himself, he did not foresee the outraged decency of masculine opinion. Boom—erang number one. The reaction from feminine hysteria acclaiming Landru as a misused darling was instantaneous. He became more monstrous by his defense than by his crime. The second boomerang could have been foreseen by any one but the criminal himself. Landru, who it is said is familiar with every corner of the law, has not concealed his knowledge in his own defense. A layman who is proficient in criminal defense reveals himself as a professional crook. Landru's minute knowledge of the law governing his own case was the strongest argument against him. The more subtle his defense, the more obvious his need of it. In short, feminine admiration and legal acumen proved his nemesis.

Jimmie Dunphy, whose matrimonial exploits have made frequent contribution to the gayety of life hereabout, recently provided a new sensation by taking unto himself a third—(or was it a fourth?)—spouse. Now after something more than a week's honeymoon the lady in the case, running true to form, asks for annulment or divorce accompanied by the usual demand for alimony. Her requirements are modest. All she wants is a thousand dollars per month in perpetuity. Now without cherishing any particular sympathy for Jimmie, it is pertinent to remark that it is about time to put a crimp in a practice which threatens to make the seeking of alimony a profession. What would be due to a faithful wife rudely bereft of her rights is hardly due the bride of a marriage contracted under the inspiration of "hootch" or its equivalent and lasting only long enough for all parties to sober up. Under such circumstances the obligations of honorable marriage hardly apply.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

Concerning the Pardon of Debs.

SAN FRANCISCO, January 1, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: I noted in the last issue of the Argonaut a somewhat labored explanation of the reason that moved the President to release Debs from prison. The reason assigned by you was neither convincing nor adequate. A whimsical quirk of the presidential mind would hardly be adequate as an explanation to a loyal American, and certainly from a long observation of Mr. Harding's career I have found nothing in it to convince me that quixotic chivalry is an amiable weakness of his character.

I am enclosing you two clippings from the Oregonian, one of which gives the official explanation of Debs' release, and the other will, I think, throw a significant sidelight on the former.

You will note that Mr. Daugherty, and not Mr. Harding, is set forth as the moving spirit in this holiday jail-delivery, and that it is laboriously explained that large numbers of our people did not believe the law under which Debs was convicted "was a just law."

Will you now permit me to offer an explanation more evident than your own, and certainly less disingenuous than Mr. Daugherty's: Senator Pomeroy's term as senator from Ohio expires this year and Mr. Daugherty is in good time currying favor with the Irish and German vote of that commonwealth. It is not a pleasant reflection by any means, but it looks that way.

H. M. YOUNG.

Maximilian Harden has advised the German government to select the most significant passages from the third volume of Bismarck's memoirs and to circulate them among all classes of Germans—"even those abroad"—in order to "indicate the character of monarchy, and of the last monarchy in particular." This is the volume containing revealing letters from the ex-Kaiser to Bismarck. It is published in this country by the Harpers under the title of "The Kaiser vs. Bismarck." Speaking of this volume, Harden said: "He [Bismarck] wrote a book warning the nation, whose majority, however, was against him and for the Kaiser. This was in 1890. The third volume of the book is especially important, as it pictures the emperor and gives an authorized warning from the empire's creator against a dilettante absolutist leading inevitably to ruin. Never since the days of Isaiah and Jeremiah have prophecies been so painfully true. The book unfortunately comes too late. In it is the tragically ironical sentence, 'I hope the next generation will reap the fruit of royal self-confidence.' It has reaped, and the taste is bitter to the tongue."

A shellfish exists on the Pacific coast of Costa Rica from which a specially fine purple color is obtained and used for dyeing silk thread. A report received by the United States Department of Commerce states the discovery of this natural dye came to light through an inquiry from Guatemala, where some silk thread imported from Costa Rica commands a good price. The dyers, who apparently are limited to a few old persons, take the thread to the shore, where the shellfish abound, and dye there. The person who picks up a shell blows his breath upon it, whereupon a few drops of greenish liquor ooze out. This liquor is collected in an open clam shell or other small container. After a sufficient quantity has been collected, the thread is passed through it. The thread soon afterward, on exposure to sunlight, assumes a beautiful purple color, which is absolutely fast. In ancient days it is believed this dye was called "Tyrian purple," and was even then so rare that it was reserved for royalty.

During 1920, 23,492 persons in Germany were convicted of profiteering.

ENGLAND AND THE SUBMARINE.

It is curious to reflect that the English statesman who so thoroughly confounded M. Sarraut a week ago in the Conference debate on submarines is the author of a "Defense of Philosophic Doubt." Like other skeptical philosophers, Mr. Balfour evidently confines his uncertainties to the domain of metaphysics. At any rate, there is one subject regarding which he entertains no manner of doubt, philosophical or other, and that is the cause of England.

His defense of the English attitude toward the submarine was a masterpiece of clear exposition and cogent pleading. It was more than that. It rose at times to a fervor of conviction that touched on sublimity. There is, in fact, an epical quality in this Balfour, descendant of a family that directed the affairs of England when her sea power began, and whom we now see employing the last of his strength and the full power of a finely matured intellect to steady her diplomatic helm through perilous seas that threaten the wreck of her argosies. But it must not be forgotten that behind that eloquence lay the combined intelligence of able advisers, for whom, as with him, the glory of England is an ultimate fact, and who are equally devoted to its fulfillment. From the days described by Kipling, when the young adventurers of the sixteenth century set forth to scour the seas for the renown of Gloriana to the present more crowded and less "spacious" time, that spirit of unified patriotism has been the enduring source of England's power.

The present dispute over the submarine represents a crisis in Britain's destiny that calls for all her united effort, as well as for "a daring pilot in extremity." It is hard for us to realize the full gravity of her position, or to believe that a nation with citizens of the temper the British still display can be in any real danger of decline.

Yet it would be folly to minimize the grimness of the threat with which Great Britain is now confronted. She herself is thoroughly aware that the submarine has reversed all the established canons of maritime strategy, that the surface dreadnought is growing obsolete, and that the time is fast approaching when the most powerful of her fighting ships will be useful only in special and subordinate contingencies of war. This fact has been emphasized by the most eminent British naval authorities. Two months before the opening of the great European war Admiral Sir Percy Scott, K.C.V.O., C.B., etc., prophesied the mastery of the submarine over the battleship in words of which the following are typical: "If a battleship is not safe either on the high seas or in a harbor, what is the use of a battleship? What we require is an enormous fleet of submarines, airships, and aeroplanes, and a few fast cruisers, provided we can find a place to keep them in safety during war-time. . . . In my opinion, as the motor vehicle has driven the horse from the road, so has the submarine driven the battleship from the sea."

The war itself failed to confirm this prediction mainly because of Germany's disadvantage as regards bases—a geographical accident which limited the scope of her operations and greatly increased her risks above those which would be necessary to a nation with a more favorable "hydrographic" position. For this reason and others of a special and local nature she was not able to increase her submarine strength as rapidly as Britain could replace the vessels she destroyed. Only this prevented the attempted food blockade from becoming finally effective. The most ingenious counter weapons and protections against the submarine, the depth bombs, the "blistered" or armored merchantman, the hydrophone, the smudge, the mystery ship, the mine trap baited with decoy vessels, camouflage, and all the other resources so efficiently employed by the English and allied fleets proved capable only of retarding the attrition. In the rare engagements between the battleships of the opposing navies, submarines caused severe losses, and practically checkmated the opponents. The war also taught England that submarine could not fight submarine, since the hydrophone was as useful to the enemy as to her own submarines. And from all this emerged the dismal conclusion that as soon as a nation with well-placed bases began to build submarines on a large scale the ascendancy of the British fleet and the security of its arteries of supply would be ended.

The situation England now faces is therefore precisely this: that unless the submarine tonnage of all countries is restricted, she will be under the necessity of replacing her sea force with new weapons, of supplanting her merchant marine to some extent with a new type of carrier, and of abandoning the strategy in which her seamen had been trained for centuries, for one that may not prove congenial to their great but peculiar powers. She will have to do this in spite of enormous hardship, over-taxation, labor protests, and the depression always consequent on such colossal waste. In the meantime disaffected colonies, sensing her weakening hold, will take the occasion to assert themselves, as the Indian Republic did the other day, and she can look for other gestures on the part of her neighbors similar to France's submarine project.

It is not, of course, to be expected that England will remain paralyzed by the emergency, grave as it is. When the life of a nation depends on any accomplishment this side of miracle, the thing is very apt to be achieved. Such necessities have been the main cause of Britain's long continuance in the vanguard of power. But the effort involved in the present crisis is so herculean and forbidding that one understands Lloyd George's emotion when he first heard of Harding's proposal of a conference on the limitation of armament. For England, that limitation concerned above all else the problem of the submarine.

Under the circumstances, her delegates showed a certain disingenuity in basing their argument against the submarine on a humanitarian basis, inhuman as are the necessities of undersea warfare. But France, in her opposition, displayed what looks like a profounder kind of disingenuity by maintaining that she wished a large number of submarines for defense, in spite of the well-known fact that the submarine is predominately a weapon of offense, and in spite of the evident advantages she can obtain by so employing it. The misfortune of England is her opportunity: an opportunity which no country of her martial habit has ever omitted to improve in the past. France has the most extraordinary series of submarine bases in Europe, and direct communication from her own shores and those of her colonies with the two bodies of water perhaps best adapted in the world to submarine attack, and covering the most vulnerable spots in the English trade routes. The drain of the war has diminished her to the status of a third-rate power: here is a means of recouping. She is poor: the submarines are relatively inexpensive, and afford a chance to achieve what has always been the prime object of military strategy—the turning of inferior into superior force. The discovery of the long bow overthrew the privileges of the chivalric order, because it made available to the poorest yeoman a weapon that was as available as fire-wood, and as effective as fire. And until the perfection of the more costly submersible dreadnought, the submarine will be for France very nearly the equivalent of such a weapon. Altogether it is an opportunity that she will not forego. And it is hard from certain points of view to see how one can blame her.

But unfortunately for her cause she has honeycombed it with contradictions. As Mr. Balfour very tactfully indicated, she owes her ability to make demands to the fact that the English fleet during the war kept clear her avenues of supply. She now expects England to renew that service whenever Germany threatens another invasion. A plain statement of her position would therefore be: "Protect me until I am in a position to gouge you." This may not be the intention, but it is the inevitable effect of her policy, and the British have every good reason for opposing it.

There are other considerations that help explain France's obstinate insistence on a large submarine fleet. She was the first naval power to adopt the submarine as a unit of the fighting fleet, unless priority is given to the "Davids" used in the American civil war and to certain small vessels that were purchased by the Russian navy, but never actually employed. In 1888 she began the formation of her powerful submarine flotilla, which now numbers over 180 vessels, by launching the Gymnote. Six more were added before the close of the last century—partly as a result of the Fashoda incident. The flotillas comprise two different types of vessel, submarines defensives and submersibles. The first are small submarines with a narrow cruising radius; the latter are large ocean-going ships like those of Great Britain, very swift and heavily armed. In examining France's claim that 35,000 tons is insufficient for her coastal defense it should be remembered that this tonnage would allow a great many more submarines defensives than submersibles—in other words, a great many small submarines, but fewer of the sort useful for offensive operations. Of late years she has been building more and more of these latter. With thirteen years' start over other nations in submarine construction, she had as large a submarine force as Britain at the beginning of the war, and would have had a greater had it not been for her system of allotting the contracts for interior mechanism and fittings to private firms and the building of the hull and assembling of the parts to the state arsenals, with a consequent loss of much valuable time. This weakness has lately been obviated. But her interest in the submarine has from the first been more acute than that of most other countries, and her activity in building submarines has been large in proportion to the size of her other units. Altogether her present policy looks like an atonement for Napoleon's failure to utilize Fulton's undersea craft as a means of disputing the dominion of the seas.

Great Britain has, of course, never had any illusions about the reason for this activity. That she has thus far not given it more attention is due to the circumstance that prior to the war the full possibilities of the submarine and its peculiar tactical advantages had not been conclusively demonstrated, and Britain was confident that speed and skilful navigation as well as accurate gunfire were of more protection to her ships than they actually proved. In addition to this there was her natural aversion to change, and firm faith in the principles of maritime warfare that had made the British navy supreme. This factor was strong enough, it will be remembered, to arouse criticism against Admiral Beatty, after the battle off Heligoland, for having failed to follow up his victory because of the menace of hostile submarines. The English imagination has never taken kindly to the submarine, even when the submarines were their own. Undersea warfare is apparently not congenial to their nature or their idea of the glory of war. None of the exploits even of their modern cruisers awaken in them the enthusiasm they feel for the days when passing merchantmen doffed topsails to their flag, when ships had to fight wind and open water as well as the enemy. In such fighting her sailors won by superior seamanship and a centuries-old familiarity with the sea. But all this inherited aptitude and experience will go for little when the submarine becomes the master weapon of the sea. The case is even worse than that; the English may quite possibly be excelled by other countries in a type of fighting that puts an accent on science and mathematical finesse rather than on the knowledge of wind and wave and the bluff gallantry and energy that are the British sailorman's best assets.

There is no disrespect to France in the statement that by temperament she is much better adapted than her neighbor to the undersea type of fighting. Here also courage of a marked kind is required, and France has it, as well as a greater genius than England for the needlepoint of precision in tactics and a tolerance of any method of fighting that proves effective. The submarine might almost be said to be made for France. She is certainly also ideally placed for it, with her ready access to the open sea and command from her own shores and from Africa of the narrows binding the chief channels of European trade. With a large submarine force she would be England's most formidable enemy, and comparatively safe from land invasion except, perhaps, through an Anglo-German alliance.

It is difficult to imagine her fighting Britain at present. But it is folly to imagine that unless great concessions are offered her she will refrain for any length of time from amply availing herself of this weapon. The very suggestion of such building is a gun at Britain's head, and in this connection the debt of France to Great Britain, and the latter power's failure to guarantee aid in the defense against Germany, have a certain importance. But even if the concessions are made, Great Britain can have little hope of permanently retarding the development of the submarine. She seems rather to be maneuvering for time in which to adapt herself to the new situation.

No nation was ever faced with a darker prospect. It is a gloomy prospect all round, for that matter, for all those who love the sea as all but the one remaining great open space of the world, and who find pleasure in the sense of enlargement its comparatively free highways afford or in the romance of its legends of gallantry and proud adventure.

But ere she succumbs to calamity Great Britain has several alternatives and one vast opportunity. As regards remedial measures, she can in the first place increase her agricultural assets, in order to make herself less dependable on outside sources of food supply in time of war. Lord Selbourne, while the war was in progress, was very quick to emphasize this idea. "After the war," he said, "the whole policy of our agricultural and economic policy of the food production at home will have to be revised in the light of our submarine experience." This will alleviate but not remove the danger. The second resource is to build large ocean-going submarines to be used as food carriers in time of blockade. The third is that, while experimenting in anti-submarine devices, she can bend all her energies, as she has already begun to do, toward expanding and perfecting her means of aerial navigation, not only as a war weapon, but for commercial uses. She can bid for supremacy over the only great open space remaining, and if she overcomes her immediate difficulties, as there is little doubt that she will, the title of queen of the air may one day partially console her for her loss of command of the seas. Among the old English legends is a story concerning one Weland the Smith, who was immured on an island by powerful enemies, but made himself wings and soared into the air to a position from which he could cast lofty derision on his former captors. For Britain this is a cheerful parable. The free highways of the air should provide space enough for her energetic spirit and a fighting area more to her taste than the underworld of waters.

These things being so, as they used to say in Gaul, I can now discard the dubious robes of prophecy in order to state an incontrovertible fact. Whatever one's sympathies in the Franco-British tangle, there is one final reason for hoping that nations threatened by the submarine will evade the menace by taking to the air. The development of the submarine has practically no utility except for purposes of war. A ship under water moves more slowly than on the surface, more dangerously, and with more discomfort to its occupants. Its channels are more confined, and it yaws and zigzags in a most unpleasant way. It is worthless for travel or commerce. It represents all but a dead loss to human progress. On the other hand the advantages of development in aerial navigation are so manifest that the advantage of speed will suggest them all. Therefore if there must be war, a war in the air will be more lively and productive in every way. And productive of higher things, if one may say so without being torpedoed. Far from it being an inevitable truth in this age that "le sceptre de Neptune est le sceptre du monde," the day may soon come when people will talk of the submarine as the contrivances in which those ingenious Frenchmen, Pathé frères, take pretty pictures of octopi and sea anenomes.

Baron Rosen, former Russian Ambassador to the United States, and one of the most noted diplomats in the world, died the last day of December as a result of a taxicab accident. During his long diplomatic career Baron Rosen was at one time consul-general for Russia in San Francisco. Among his other important posts in the foreign service of the empire were those of vice-consul at Yokohama, secretary of the legation at Tokyo, chargé d'affaires at Washington, D. C., consul-general at New York, minister to Mexico, Serbia, Bavaria, Greece, and Japan, and ambassador to the United States from 1905 to 1911. Roman Romanovitch Rosen was an exile from his native land since the overthrow of the Kerensky régime by the Bolsheviks. Previously he was a friend and adviser of the late Czar Nicholas. His widow, Baroness Elizabeth Alexievna Rosen, is the daughter of General Odintzoff, who was governor-general of Warsaw for years under the old rulers of the empire. Baron Rosen was born in 1849 of Swedish stock that settled in Lithuania with the invasion of Gustavas Adolphus in the seventeenth century. The family includes many eminent scholars, writers, diplomats, and generals. Baron Rosen was a distinguished scholar, musician, and linguist. He was an advocate of world peace.

The new Liberal premier, William Lyon Mackenzie King, has taken the reins of government in Canada and has announced his cabinet appointments. Often I long, in cities wrung by care,
Awhile in ancient solitudes to sink,
And stand delaying at a rillet's brink.
The pilgrim hears but woodland murmurs there,
And water falling with a sound like prayer
In hidden pools where only thrushes drink,
The singing silver joining, link by link,
Their shadowed crystal, pure as ocean air.

Hold cool your canyons, O eternal hills!
For where the voices are not I would be,
Led to your heart by those betraying rills.
Happy, tho for a little, that release,—
In twilights where old memories summon me
To drain the lonely chalice of your peace.

Not a client in sight!
And Jack argued aright,—
Can a man support life on a cracker?
So, the girl looking sweet,
Though her father killed meat,
He became son-in-law to a packer.

It follows that Jacky
Now buys his tobaccky
With money that once was a pig!
And hair that was bristles,
And sharper than thistles,
He thinks he can feel in his wig.

Once to music inclined
Of a primitive kind,
He would sing as a coster should feel:
He has ceased to rejoice
In the sound of his voice,
For he fears it resembles a squeal.

Can the old man have sinned
In the meat that he tinned?
Queried Jack in a conjugal fear:
For a cutup he knew,
Every infant or two,
By heredity's law might appear.

He halloo'd with new hope,

What a theme for a bard,
These misfortunes of lard!
What a song of mankind in the making!
Looking down on the pen
Of the pigs and the men,
How the gods in Olympus are shaking!

Arthur Symons, the English poet and essayist, has scattered through his critical writings not a few judgments on the art of poetry which are memorable: "All charm in verse, however frail and careful, is born of some energy at white heat. . . . Poetry is an act of creation. A flower has come up out of the soil of the earth, it has all the age of the earth in its roots and the novelty of the instant in its fragrant life. . . . In real poems, slight or brief though they be, we have the single imaginative act: something has been done which has never been done before and will never be done again. . . . It is a common mistake to suppose that poetry should be ornate and prose simple. It is prose that may often allow itself the relief of ornament; poetry, if it is to be of the finest quality, is bound to be simple, a mere breathing, in which individual words almost disappear into music."

THE CONQUESTS OF ALEXANDRA.

Mr. W. R. H. Trowbridge Describes the Triumphs of the Last and Gentlest of the Danish Invaders.

The uproar of enthusiasm with which Princess Alexandra of Glucksburg was greeted on her first arrival in London continued to reverberate long after the ceremony that made her Princess of Wales. The ceremony itself was comparatively private, being witnessed only by a chosen group of eminent people, but this select gathering included, fortunately, a certain few with the eyes and pens of trained observers. It is interesting that more than one of these, Thackeray among them, was struck by the young bride's resemblance to princesses in the fairy lore of the sea kingdom from which she came:

An extreme pallor, accentuated by the whiteness of her bridal dress, gave her beauty an indefinable air of caste. She looked the personification of Pedigree. Every lineament of her flower-like features, every movement of her graceful form, bore the unmistakable impress of royal lineage.

"Her face," said Dickens, "was very pale and full of a sort of awe and wonder. It was the face of no ordinary bride, not simply a timid, shrinking girl, but one with a distinctive character of her own, prepared to act a part greatly."

Glittering with jewels and enveloped in voluminous folds of dazzling whiteness trailing behind her like foam, she seemed to float rather than walk up the Gothic nave.

"There was no one present," added Dickens, "who did not feel the effect of that slowness of progress which carried the bride so gradually and with such almost imperceptible movement past them."

Thackeray declared that, as he watched her advancing thus, followed by her eight bridesmaids similarly attired, he was reminded of the princesses in the fairy-tale who had been changed into swans.

Suddenly, in the midst of this almost enchanted scene, a human chord was struck. Queen Victoria was seen to withdraw into the interior of her lofty pew, weeping bitterly. At the sound of Jenny Lind's glorious voice chanting the Chorale to the solemn sorrowful music of the Prince Consort, which had been specially chosen for the occasion, she had been reminded of that terrible day fifteen months before, when, on the very spot on which the bridal couple now stood, she had gazed distracted upon the coffin of her beloved husband. "The sight of her grief cast a momentary awe over the ceremony, which rendered the emotions of those present almost sublime."

Frith, the most popular painter of the day, was commissioned by the queen to depict the scene in St. George's Chapel. Countless engravings of his picture were published, and sold throughout the country.

As for the press, adulation was the key-note of all its reports. For once the voice of faction was silent, and papers of every shade of opinion united to eulogize the royal family. On the wedding morning Tennyson's famous "Welcome" appeared in the Times:

Sea-king's daughter from over the sea,
Alexandra!
Saxon and Norman and Dane are we,
But all of us Danes in our welcome of thee,
Alexandra!

Artists tried in vain to capture her elusive beauty on their canvases. Their failure was hardly discreditable, for, as the Christmas books reveal from year to year, no artist can really hope to draw a fairy princess. Later, when she grew more accustomed to posing, Benjamin Constant succeeded in painting a portrait of her that those who knew her conceded to be a likeness, though they insisted on some strange and exquisite quality that had escaped the artist's skill.

Throughout her career as Princess of Wales something of this atmosphere of romantic aloofness still clung to her. She was almost too beautiful, in a spiritualized and unworldly way, to be associated with the idea of government, and her political power seemed rather negligible. Politically, she opposed the will of Victoria on only one occasion, and lost. When her father, Christian IX, ascended the throne of Denmark on the death of Frederick VII, he found himself confronted with a very serious problem, involving the status of the Schleswig-Holstein duchies:

The son of the old Duke of Augustenburg, who had renounced his claims to the duchies in 1852 for a money compensation, refused to be bound by his father's bargain. Encouraged by Germany, he at once proclaimed himself Duke of Schleswig-Holstein, and was received with acclamation by the people, who believed his claim was based on justice and right. At the same time Bismarck demanded the withdrawal of the bill within forty-eight hours, and to enforce this demand, an army of Prussians and Austrians entered Holstein. The Danes, counting on the armed intervention of England, France, and Russia, guaranteed by the treaty of 1852, determined to resist. The victorious issue of the First Schleswig War had bred over-confidence. Any one who ventured to suggest caution was denounced as a coward or traitor. Unable to defend Holstein, the Danish army, 40,000 strong, entrenched itself in Schleswig.

But treaties are merely temporary expedients. Such moral force as they possess is based on fluctuating national interest. Russia, which had not yet recovered from the Crimean War, drew back at the start. France appeared cynically indifferent. She even secretly sought to obtain from Germany "advantages on the Rhine" as the price of her neutrality. England alone manifested an inclination to respect the treaty. The British government offered to discuss the question at a conference in London. The proposal was rejected by Prussia, and the Second Schleswig War began.

It goes without saying that the daughter of Christian IX could not remain an idle spectator of the struggle. The Danes, who, with this very contingency in view, had regarded her marriage to the Prince of Wales with so much satisfaction, now counted on her to obtain the aid of England. In this they were encouraged by the loudly expressed popular sympathy with their cause which had been aroused here by the sight of a small country being bullied by two large ones. Meetings were held all over England to urge the government to take action. The great popularity of the princess served still further to strengthen the agitation in favor of armed intervention.

To induce the British government to come to the assistance of Denmark, the princess strained every nerve. In this she received staunch support from her husband. The Prince of Wales quite openly expressed his sympathy for Denmark, and gave free vent to his indignation at the failure of the powers to support the Danes as they had undertaken to do by the terms of the London Protocol of 1852. He refused to allow the Austrian ambassador to meet the princess, and, to emphasize his contempt, told the French ambassador very significantly what he thought of the pusillanimous conduct of his government. In his opinion the Danes were right to resist. "They are a brave people," he said, "who prefer death to any kind of humiliation."

The chief obstacle to a war on behalf of Denmark with Prussia and Austria, to which the country seemed to be drifting, was Queen Victoria. She was resolved on neutrality, and there was no length to which she was not prepared to go to maintain it. The conduct of the Prince of Wales greatly annoyed her, and it only served to strengthen her determination to deny him any participation in the affairs of state. As for the princess, the queen warned her of the danger of attempting to influence the policy of the government. To silence all further opposition in her family, she refused to allow the subject of Schleswig-Holstein to be mentioned in her presence.

Alexandra's failure in these negotiations was a bitter disappointment to her. From thenceforth she confined herself to the social rôle that Queen Victoria's withdrawal from active participation in court life, on the death of the Prince Consort, had assigned to her and Prince Edward. Under their auspices the court of England became the most brilliant and hospitable in Europe. The importance of their social influence was, of course, very great. It represented, though indirectly, a strong counterpoise to the pro-German policy of Victoria, and supported the opposition of all the members of the House of Glucksburg, from the Russian Empress Marie to King George of Greece, toward Prussia and the designs of Bismarck. Antipathy for the latter was one of Alexandra's few acerbities. Once when the Emperor William I of Germany visited the British court, he playfully asked one of her children what it would like as a present. The princess, who was standing near by, whispered loudly enough for the emperor to hear, "The head of Bismarck!"

Denied the freedom and authority accorded to her sister Dagmar, who became Empress Marie of Russia, Alexandra confined herself faithfully to her domestic and social duties. Her attitude of good sense toward the occasional convivialities of the Prince of Wales won her added credit and respect:

The celebrated Baccarat Case, in which the Heir to the Throne was accidentally associated, in lifting the veil from the private life of the Prince of Wales, exposed the baseness of the public standard. The fullness with which it was reported corresponded exactly to the public interest in it. The light thrown on this cause célèbre, as well as upon all similar ones, revealed something much more disagreeable than the failings of a certain section of society. From the point of view of strict morality, the real evil lay, not in the failure of an Heir to a Throne to be the ideal example of democracy, but in the scabrous interest the public took in the case.

In reality it was public opinion that stood condemned before its own bar.

The Prince of Wales, writing to the Archbishop of Canterbury, attributed the attacks to which he was subjected to politics, and complained bitterly of their injustice. Abroad, opinion was entirely on his side. The French thought he might well be allowed to complain of the injustice which not only forbade any right to privacy, but enjoined on him a line of conduct that was not equally binding on his subjects. In America, where opinion was extremely sympathetic, it was felt that he had been made "a scape-goat of to appease a guilty public conscience and to furnish material for a conscienceless gutter press."

If democracy, in this attempt to deprive royalty of the power to gratify the desire for privacy, really sought a scape-goat it was shrewd enough, on second thoughts, to recognize the futility. Instead of breaking its "mirror," it made excuses for its unflattering reflection.

Such a volte-face justifies the cynicism of La Rochefoucauld. Its expediency appealed to the public with whose elastic morals it was fully in keeping.

It appealed also to the princess, though for very different reasons. Living in the throne-light herself, she knew how it magnified and distorted all it illuminated. Excuses came easier to her than complaints. Brought up as she had been, marriage meant something more to her than a mere legal formality. She interpreted her marriage vows literally. For her, all the duties of wifehood were contained in the words "for better or worse." The fact, too, that she was something more than a wife heightened their importance. She never forgot that she was the consort of the Heir to the Throne, and as such had to maintain the dignity of her position.

Both as princess and queen, Alexandra will be long remembered for those acts of impulsive generosity and charity that endeared her to people of every rank and opinion throughout the world. Mr. Trowbridge recalls such characteristic incidents as her letter to Mrs. Gladstone on the death of the great Scots statesman, her departure from the precedent of British royalty when she placed a wreath on the bier of Cecil Rhodes, and her presentation of a consolation cup to Dorando, the plucky little Italian who all but won the Marathon race in the Olympian games of 1908. Such generousities are not easily forgotten and they will lend an enduring brightness to her name in the chronicles of monarchy.

Among the notes regarding her wide travels as Princess of Wales, the following page from the diary of her lady-in-waiting, Mrs. Grey, who accompanied her on her voyage to the Nile, is typical:

The day before her departure up the Nile the princess, by virtue of her sex, saw what has ever been to Europeans the most alluring side of Mohammedan life, because no "Christian dog" of a man has ever seen it and lived to tell the tale—the harem.

Isma'il's rivaled that of the most splendid Caliphs of Bagdad.

The reception of the princess as described by Mrs. Grey, her lady-in-waiting, is like a scene in "The Arabian Nights." On arriving at the Palace of the Nile, a vast Oriental pile with many courts and fountains, they were conducted through an immense and beautiful garden to the entrance of the harem, where they found awaiting them the viceroy's mother, La Grande Princesse, his wives, his daughters, and a retinue of slaves. Each wore a dress of a different color richly embroidered all over with gold, and trousers of some soft white material.

"On their heads were enormous tiaras, very heavy, though splendid with precious stones; one really more beautiful than another. Necklaces, too, with diamonds as big a shilling piece, and drops of diamonds cut round like crystals, and quite enormous.

"Each had a ring of a single diamond with no setting to be seen at all. That of La Grande Princesse was so large that she could only wear it on the middle finger.

"Each wife wore a belt about three inches wide, all set quite close with very large diamonds, and uncut emeralds and rubies. I never saw anything to equal it; no gold setting to be seen at all—only these beautiful stones. They had also the viceroy's picture on the left shoulder set in enormous diamonds."

Taking the princess by the hand, La Grande Princesse led the way, followed by the rest in procession, through rows of slaves, to an immense room. Here they all paused a moment to "eat a cherry on a most beautiful gold tray, with goblets of gold and precious stones." They then proceeded to another room, "in the middle of which was a kind of round silver table, about one foot high from the floor, with large square cushions placed all round it."

The princess having taken her place on a cushion beside La Grande Princesse à la Turque like the rest, was given a tortoise-shell spoon with a coral-branch handle by a turbaned and trousered female slave dressed in black and yellow satin embroidered in gold. An elaborate repast of many courses was then served, most of which, when the tortoise-shell spoon was not employed, the princess ate with her fingers in the Oriental fashion, after which she washed her hands in a silver basin and dried them on a napkin fringed with gold.

The impression this visit produced on the princess was so delightful that she expressed the wish to see how she would look in a yashmak. The harem ladies, "whom she had charmed," were only too pleased to gratify her, and, having dressed her and Mrs. Grey up in the most approved fashion, were so entranced with the effect that they entreated them to drive home in this manner and "make the Princes of Wales believe that the princess had been kept in the harem and a slave sent instead."

This the princess, who thoroughly entered into the spirit of the joke, consented to do, and departed like a veiled lady of the East, to the intense amusement and regret of her hostesses, to whom her visit had been as great an event in their lives as it had been in hers. The prince, who was dining with the viceroy, had not yet returned when she reached the Esbekieh Palace, but she and Mrs. Grey had at least "the satisfaction of thoroughly mystifying dear M. Kanné, our invaluable courier," before their disguise was detected.

Which quite naturally makes way for a great author whose name is closely linked with the Orient. Pierre Loti's description of his visit to the queen in London is of particular interest as from one who had no sympathy for the pretensions of the British crown in the East, or prejudice in this royal lady's favor:

"Suddenly the queen appeared—the queen, as astonishingly young by day as by night, and clad so simply that, had it not been for the supreme distinction of her person, nothing would have betrayed her rank. The pause before she spoke seemed to deepen the stillness of the empty palace. It is very embarrassing to talk for the first time to one of whom you know nothing, above all one enveloped in royal majesty, and who knows much of you through books in which you have revealed yourself too plainly. When the queen spoke of my travel, my books, I experienced something like remorse as I thought of my attacks on England, and I entangled myself in embarrassed excuses.

"Oh," interrupted the queen, with a trustfulness which touched me more than if she had reproached me, 'that belongs to the past, I am sure.'

"Yes, madame," I replied, 'that belongs to the past.' Then I recalled uneasily a certain article on Rangoon, about to appear, in which I had bitterly criticized the British occupation of Burma. Mon dieu! shall I have time to suppress it, at least to tone it down? Oh, the gentleness, the goodness, the rectitude, apparent from the very first moment in this queen! . . .

"After a time which appeared to me very short, but which was almost long for an audience, her majesty deigned to ask me if I would like to see the palace. To see it in such company never should I have dared to hope! She rose, and I followed her for a never-to-be-forgotten promenade in the vast deserted pile.

"From the simple, unpretentious private apartment we passed suddenly into magnificent saloons with gilded ceilings, marble colonnades, and walls covered with priceless masterpieces, without meeting a soul. The queen, with her exquisite hand, unlocked and opened the heavy gilded doors as we passed through the silent and deserted rooms, in all of which, though about to be abandoned, there were clusters of blue hortensias, pink azaleas, orchids and lilies, arranged as if for a fête!"

Among the various objects the rooms contained the queen indicated two full-length portraits of herself and discussed their merits with Pierre Loti. She also pointed out a picture of Queen Victoria, "a dear little child in a charming early nineteenth-century group," and asked him if he could guess who it was. She stopped, too, "with an expression of wonderful tenderness," to show him the portrait of the son of whom death had robbed her—the young Duke of Clarence.

"By the delicacy and adorable simplicity of her manner my guide almost made me forget that she was not only the grande dame she had the air of being, but that she was also Alexandra of Denmark, Queen of England, and Empress of India, who on great occasions entered these rooms in state, glittering with historic diamonds, and took her place on the throne which today was covered up like any ordinary chair!"

"In this fashion we arrived in a vestibule overlooking a monumental staircase. Her majesty extended her hand. While I bowed over it she disappeared, and I found myself suddenly quite alone and conscious of an affinity for this queen so visibly noble and good.

"It was evidently intended that I should descend the stairs. But where was I, in what part of the palace? Inquiry was impossible. There was not a vestige of life anywhere. After ascending in a little lift, almost clandestinely, I now descended by a grand staircase, not knowing whither I was going. At the bottom there were still magnificent rooms, all deserted and still. I passed closed doors not daring to knock, daring still less to open them. After several minutes I met, by chance, a lacquey who conducted me to the entrance where my carriage awaited me.

"If I had seen Buckingham Palace under any other circumstances, one of a crowd on a state occasion, I should probably retain no lasting impression. But that queen, those flowers, the solitude, the stillness! I felt as if I had been in an enchanted palace."

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco's bank clearings for the week ended December 31, 1921 (five days), were $124,100,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $123,300,000; an increase of $800,000.

Conditions in the United States today indicate that the year 1922 as a whole will be more satisfactory to business than the year just ended. Our forecast is that profits will depend more on economy of operation than on expansion of volume. With the many favorable factors now operating, business men should not fear to make plans for the new year, but they should plan with care and conservatism, and with constant effort toward reduction of costs (says the National Bank of Commerce in New York in its monthly review).

Financial improvement continues. Progress has been made in reduction of excess stocks of manufactured goods. Accumulations of raw materials have been reduced. The rate of production in the major industries has shown little change during the closing weeks of the year. Losses in some lines have been offset by gains in others, the net result being that the gains over the low level of 1921 have been held.
The last twelve months have witnessed great progress toward stable financial condi-ons in business. Combined gold reserves of the twelve Federal Reserve Banks have increased by more than 40 per cent., while discounts for member banks have dropped 56 per cent. and Federal Reserve Notes in actual circulation have declined 28 per cent. The Federal Reserve system once more proves to be a system designed to care for increases and decreases in the volume of credit, with the requisite elasticity to do this easily. The uttermost in the position of member banks, while not so striking, is nevertheless satisfactory.

Notwithstanding the consistent improvement in financial conditions, recovery in manufacture and trade has been slow. Unemployment in the chief countries shows little decline from the high point reached early in the year, and it may well reach new high figures during January and February, when normally there is an increase in the number of those out of work in North America and Europe. Manufactured goods continue to move slowly and uncertainly into the channels of consumption.

In last analysis, the business of the world rests on a physical, not a financial foundation. Failure of balance between world-wide supply of and effective demand for physical goods forced the violent readjustment of the last two years; a readjustment which will not be complete until this physical balance has again been established.

The wool situation illustrates particularly well the various factors which have prevented a return to normal conditions. It has continued to accumulate, partly because central Europe has not been able to purchase in the expected amounts, partly because an important part of the wool supply is a by-product, and partly because the building up of flocks is so slow a process that flock-masters reduce them only when they have given up hope of profits.

With curtailment of production and increased demand, copper stocks are showing reduction. The short American and Egyptian cotton crops have served to bring the world's cotton supply approximately to a pre-war normal. Stocks of hides and skins are large in many countries, but are moving more freely into consumption. The prices of rubber and sugar are still below the cost of production. Sisal stocks carried over from last year now constitute nearly two-thirds of a normal year's supply. The world's wheat production is in a satisfactory state of balance in that there is an adequate supply and a sustained demand. The American farmer, in the face of a new corn crop of 3,152,000,000 bushels, is carrying over 281,000,000 bushels from the record crop of 1920. There is also an accumulation in other less well-known commodities.

This accumulation of physical goods is not a misfortune. It assures to the world a supply of cheap food and clothing, and real prosperity has never rested on any other basis. But producers of raw materials constitute much more than half of the buying power of the world, and the conclusion is inevitable that the entire economic structure will gradually adjust itself to the raw material market.

The essential step toward recovery is removal of the burden of expenditures for war. The countries which are wasting their money and effort on armaments are those whose markets must absorb the world's excess of raw materials, and pay for it with manufactures.

The terrific burden of war debts and preparation for war is clearly shown by data recently prepared by the Federal Reserve Board. The board states that in 1920, of a total net public expenditure by Great Britain of £1,145,928,000, 30.5 per cent. were for public debt charges and 25.5 per cent. were for national defense; by France, of a total of 52,183,217,000 francs, 22.7 per cent. were for public debt charges, and 50.7 per cent. were for national defense. In 1919, Italy's total public expenditures were 32,150,100,000 lire, of which 8.4 per cent. were for public debt charges, and 83.9 per cent. for national defense. German expenditures in 1920 were 61,470,870,000 marks, 14.5 per cent. being for public debt charges, and 60.2 per cent. for national defense.

Expenditures for the payment of interest and principal of the public debt do not curtail current purchasing power. They merely transfer it. That curtailment occurred when in the first place the debts were incurred for military and naval purposes. But current expenditures for national defense constitute a direct levy on the present purchasing powers of a people. Labor expended to make guns and submarines can not pay for hides from Argentina or wool from Australia.

It is too much to hope to destroy the anarchy of armament at one blow, but in so far as concrete results may be attained, they offer the first real hope of recovery from the economic stagnation of the world. A combined saving by the United States, the United Kingdom, and Japan on armaments of only $500,000,000 in a single year is equivalent to the pre-war value of the exports of wool from both Argentina and Australia for nearly three years.

America's industrial progress is inextricably linked with her foreign trade, and it is impossible for the United States to achieve its pre-war prosperity by a revival of domestic business alone. Dr. Henry A. E. Chandler, economist of the National Bank of Commerce in New York, says.

Dr. Chandler takes issue with those who believe that, since foreign trade represents not more than 10 to 15 per cent. of America's total commerce, the loss of a part of it would leave a sufficient percentage of the whole to insure reasonable prosperity. In the January number of the bank's magazine, Commerce Monthly, he points out that economic investigation proves that "even during periods of depression, volume of national business, after allowing for price changes, seldom departs from normal by more than 15 per cent., and often by smaller percentages; and a seemingly small reduction in the percentage of gross business may have great significance when translated into terms of net profits and thus into final buying capacity."

"In view of the decline in foreign buying capacity it has been suggested that we may have to reduce our output to conform much more nearly to domestic demand and thus in the future prevent the accumulation of surpluses similar to those that have so recently demoralized some of our principal markets," he continues. "Undoubtedly such a reduction can be effected in part, and indeed, to some extent, has already been done, but as a practical movement upon a large scale it is beset with great difficulties."

"If, for example, we lose only 5 per cent. of our total national business through the reduction in our foreign trade it does not mean that each industry loses only 5 per cent. The relative importance of foreign trade varies widely as between different industries. In some the proportion of foreign to total trade is insignificant, while in others it is as high as one-third or nearly one-half. It is possible, therefore, that a reduction in foreign trade, amounting to no more than 5 per cent. of our total trade, may so effectively cripple some of our basic industries as to wipe out all profits and even to bring heavy losses."

"Our domestic trade will, of course, continue to be of much the larger importance in our economic life, and even if international economic affairs should remain in a highly unsettled condition we would, undoubtedly, make important substitutions and readjustments within our own territory that would contribute to the relief of our domestic business situation. Such readjustments are in part already under way. Indeed it is not at all clear that the uncertainty as to the international situation is an unmixed evil. In forcing us to look more closely for possible readjustments at home, consequent efficiency may, in the end, bring some lasting benefits.

"On the other hand we must not overlook the fact that readjustments leading to increased efficiency may still leave in important cases a productive capacity in excess of domestic demands. Under these conditions individual producers can not be expected to reduce their output simply because there exists an excess in the aggregate, at least not until they have been convinced that they may not capture a larger proportion of the home trade than they have heretofore obtained. Those who are familiar with the history of the destructive competition among railroads and industrial plants that led to the formation of the pools, the trusts, and other forms of combinations between 1870 and 1900 will not have difficulty in visualizing what would happen if individual producers should all start out to capture a larger share of a domestic trade that in the aggregate is insufficient for them all.

"It is true that a radical amendment of our anti-trust acts might render possible price-controlling agreements that would lessen the destructive effects of competition. Such arrangements, however, would still leave the problem of surplus products partly unsolved. Moreover, the problem of amending our present laws, with a view to maintaining a whole-some degree of competition and preventing unreasonable price fixing without imposing upon business men great uncertainty as to what could be legally done, is extraordinarily difficult. As a practical matter, therefore, unless we are to face the possibility of an industrial competition of an intensity hitherto unknown—that indeed may dissipate part of our productive energy—we must recover in the foreign field sufficient trade to carry off the output of our surplus productive capacity.

"It may appear the easiest way in our present dilemma to let international matters 'take their natural course' and to concentrate upon the home market. It may be well doubted, however, that the final cost of such a course in money and energy will be less to the nation than a course that would call for our active coöperation in the international economic and financial reconstruction that is necessary to a recovery of the buying capacity of the rest of the world. the path of progress. Large industrial nations will continue to have political and, in some cases, even racial boundaries, but they can no longer have economic boundaries. Economic units and the forces that control their actions are now world-wide. Moreover, the resumption of our pre-war prosperity and the continuance of our normal growth involve an ever-increasing dependence upon international conditions. The whole course of our future economic development, therefore, lies clearly in the direction of a larger coöperation in international economic activities."

Signs of awakening, after an industrial depression, have always manifested themselves first in an improvement in bonds and investments, and for the reason that persons with an accumulation of funds—not every individual suffers losses through a trade reaction—are either unable to employ their money advantageously in business, in consequence of the prevailing inactivity, or because they have become frightened and are unwilling to assume ordinary risks. They turn naturally to bonds to obtain a fair rate of interest for their money or to conserve the principal sum, and their operations always result in an enhancement in prices. Such movements always anticipate any improvement which is certain to develop in the speculative market and in general business later on, and they may, and upon certain occasions they have, anticipated the betterment in other directions by many months (says Harper's Magazine).

If the various factors and circumstances which have influenced the present depression in industry were confined to the developments and the conditions prevailing in this country alone there would be no two opinions regarding the significance of the sharp advance in bonds. Every one would hail it as the precursor of an early and sustained recovery in business, and, even now, that may be the outcome, for the domestic situation has certainly improved. But opinions are divided in consequence of the fact that every experienced observer appreciates that the depression is of world-wide application and has been influenced as much by conditions abroad as by developments at home, and possibly more so, and this feature gains in significance when you consider the possibilities and the probabilities of a business revival, from the fact that, while affairs here are on the mend, they appear to be growing steadily, and even alarmingly, worse in Europe.

"China is entirely dependent upon foreign machinery and methods for the development of natural resources or the creation of an industrial organization," says the National Bank of Commerce in New York in the January issue of its magazine, Commerce Monthly, "and it is not surprising that there should be keen international competition for Chinese trade."

"Despite a very low average standard of living the absence of industrial development makes China a large user of foreign goods. Japan, the British Empire, and the United States are the chief competitors," continues the bank, "and it is of interest to note that since the close of the war imports into China from Great Britain and the United States have more than doubled in value, while those from Japan have slightly declined. Imports have been increasing steadily in the past decade, except for the war period, and in 1920 reached a total of 762 million Haikwan taels, the equivalent of slightly over a billion dollars at the average rate of exchange for that year."

"Cotton manufactures form more than half the total of both the British and the Japanese trade and are important in the imports from the United States. In the American trade illuminating oils and tobacco are by far the most valuable items. Both Great Britain and the United States send iron and steel manufactures, machinery of all kinds, and electrical goods in considerable quantity."

The Freeman, Smith & Camp Company are offering $450,000 Reedley Joint Union High School District, Fresno and Tulare counties, California, 6 per cent. bonds, dated May 9, 1921, and due serially annually to May 9, 1947.

Reedley Joint Union High School District comprises about 93,440 acres, includes the cities of Reedley, Orange Cove, and Navelencia, and is located in the southern part of Fresno County. It is one of the best developed and improved fruit and farming districts in Fresno County. It is watered by the Alta Irrigation System, consisting of about 400 miles of canals with a charge for water averaging only about 45 cents per acre annually and considered one of the finest irrigation districts and systems in the United States. Reedley, principal city in the district, population 2500, is a modern, well-built city situated on the Southern Pacific and Santa Fé railroads, containing two banks with aggregate deposits of over $1,800,000, several large packing houses, a fine, large, modern cannery, two newspapers, and the usual business houses.

These bonds have been issued to provide funds for the construction of a fine, new, modern high school which when completed will be one of the finest country high school systems in the state. The rapid growth of the district has made necessary the construction of this school system.

George H. Burr & Co. are offering a new issue of the Utah Construction Company first (closed) mortgage 7½ per cent. serial gold bonds, price 100 and interest, to yield 7½ per cent., due serially to December 1, 1936.

These bonds will constitute, in the opinion of counsel, an absolute, closed first mortgage on approximately 208,000 acres of ranch and range lands in Nevada, Utah, and Idaho, which property has been conservatively appraised at $4,221,400, or more than 333 per cent. of the total bond issue. The lands have an appraised value of over $20 an acre, while the debt per acre is only $6. Approximately 43,000 acres of this property is bottom land lying along streams. More than 19,000 acres are under irrigation and the company owns primary water rights sufficient to irrigate a considerably larger acreage.

Net assets of the Utah Construction Company, shown by the report of auditors, as of November 30, 1921, and after giving consideration to the value of the mortgaged property established by our appraisers, were $8,621,713 or 6.9 times the total bond issue. These bonds are a direct obligation and the only funded debt of the company.

McDonnell & Co. announce that Mr. Robert M. Ridley, who has long been connected with their organization, has recently been admitted to partnership in the firm and is now associated with Mr. H. L. Mack as resident partner.

Regardless of differences that may arise from time to time between the men and the managements of the railroads, both of them unite in desire to give the public good service, William Sproule, president of the Southern Pacific Company, said in a statement made public recently.

The railroads, Mr. Sproule pointed out, are permitted under the Transportation Act to earn a return upon the value of so much of their properties as is used in the transportation business. Because this value is fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission "talk about earnings on watered stock or inflated values means nothing," he said.

After discussing the new status of the railroads under the United States Railroad Labor Board, Mr. Sproule said "the railroads enter 1922 with the knowledge that the public interest must always prevail and are bending every effort to have their equipment in condition that will justify the public expectation of good service. In return the railroads ask the public to see that we are fairly treated."

Stockholders in the firm of Reid Brothers, Inc., manufacturers of hospital supplies, who are building a new factory at Irvington, in Alameda County, this week received checks for last quarter dividends at the rate of 8 per cent. The company has never in its history of thirteen years of business failed to pay dividends on its common stock at the rate of 8 per cent. or better.

Officials of the firm anticipate that with the completion of the new factory, giving them approximately double their present production capacity, and with the further extension of their selling organization, which is now being extended to approximately a world-wide scale, giving them direct representation for the business of above 25,000 hospitals and the medical profession everywhere, to whom they sell goods direct, the sales will materially increase, with resultant greater profits.

The letter accompanying the dividend checks was in part as follows:

"Our company has completed a very satisfactory business year, and while we did not entirely escape the effects of the generally adverse business conditions, it is believed that the hospital supply business was less seriously affected than almost any other line.

"Hospital construction, seriously curtailed during the past three years, is being resumed on a basis of remarkable activity. Many new hospitals will be completed during 1922, giving promise of a record year for the hospital supply business."

From almost every state in the West comes the plea of industry for tax reduction.

Practically every Western state is loaded with a political overhead which would not be justified by ten times the population.

Every public official denies all responsibility for the increased tax burden and says, "If the people vote these measures what can I do?"

Admitting without argument that the people are to blame for all the tax burdens under which they stagger at present, what is to be done about it?

Obviously if the people are responsible for the tax increase it is up to the people to see that they get a tax reduction.

When tax reduction is suggested the present beneficiaries of our tax system say it simply can not be done, but the fact remains that it must be done.

BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

In his vigorous sketch of the character of Lord Kitchener, Lord Esher has quoted Johnson's truism, "We can not trust the characters of history unless they are drawn by those who knew their persons." In other words, no one has a right to publish a man's biography unless he has known him, and known him long and well. This statement is so obvious, the only wonder is that any one, least of all a biographer, need be reminded of it. And yet of seven biographies before me, three only were written by contemporary acquaintances. And one suspects that each of these is prejudiced either one way or the other. The only reliable form of biography is autobiography, and few great men have the time or courage to explain their lives and apologize for them. Though the want of that sort of mental ex- position to clear the historic atmosphere is keenly felt.

Biography, as one of the most important adjuncts of written history, should be a carefully cultivated art. It is unfortunate that many great men object to being biographed, but the ray of consolation here is that statesmen are usually not of their number. And it is comparatively unimportant whether the annals of literature are accurate or not. Thackeray, for instance, objected to being reduced to the humility of an unctuous "life." He evidently believed it to be impossible for a life to avoid both the Scylla and Charybdis of unctious and spite. However delightful it would be to have an intimate life of Thackeray or—dare one say?—Shakespeare, we yet have stumbled along a good many years without them. In the case of Shakespeare we must continue to do so, and if the few remaining acquaintances of Thackeray do not speedily do something about him, that, too, will be too late. But the real need is for accurate lives of the men who make history and every statesman, soldier, diplomat, or history-carver of any sort should feel it incumbent upon himself—part of his public duty—to write or superintend the writing of his own biography.

Such a book is "From Private to Field Marshal," by Sir William Robertson (Houghton Mifflin; $5). This is an autobiography of the finest sort—written from an historic viewpoint, with the proper perspective of personal and public affairs and equally interesting in its descriptions of old-time barrack life in Ireland—quaintly reminiscent of Lever—and in its technical treatment of the European war. Sir William Robertson also has the rare quality for biography writing which, one must admit all great leaders of men have not, of a total absence of malice toward all men. He is an ideal historian in his objective treatment of both his own career and his contemporaries.

Of the latter the most interesting, especially in conjunction with Lord Esher's "The Tragedy of Lord Kitchener," is Sir William's picture of Kitchener of Khartoum.

Kitchener was one of the most misunderstood of men—a fact that scarcely needs exploiting. Lord Esher has tried to explain the curious tragedy, but he has merely given us food for thought. It was something inherent in Kitchener's own personality. If he had been disliked by the people at large one could understand it. It is said that he was never known to address a private soldier. That was part of his impersonal make-up. K. of K. must have been a hero even to his valet. And it was his historic mould, probably, that stood between him and sympathy. One admires, but is not on a sympathetic basis with monuments of heroic stature. Oddly enough, it was his fate to be worshiped by the public and maligned by his intimates. The public gets the full benefit of admiring an heroic monument. It doesn't have to live intimately with one miraculously endowed with human life. The theory is a bit fantastic, but in Lord Kitchener's case one must have recourse to speculation. He did not explain himself and it is my contention that a man of his dimensions should even at the cost of his personal pride record his principles and working practices, so that he could be judged in their light, and not according to popular and in his case malicious prejudice. There is a Hindu proverb to the effect that one should not stoop to tie his shoe while passing through his neighbor's melon patch. It is possible that Kitchener's life is merely a horrible example of not obeying this bit of Oriental wisdom. It was part of his innate bigness not even to see the small nature of other men who might misinterpret him. He scorned compromise of any sort. Lord Esher says of him that "he neither asked nor took the advice of any man" with reference to the military transformation of the old Regular into a new National army, which was "his achievement, and his alone." And it is not too much to assume that asking and taking advice was not one of Kitchener's characteristics. Have we not possibly here the explanation of the peculiarly unfair attitude of so many of his higher subordinates? Again Esher says, "He neither argued nor discussed; he simply ignored. And yet he liked and respected his subordinates, and resented criticism directed against them." This latter generous phase of Kitchener's is also commented on by Sir William Robertson. Robertson says, "I know that he many times stood up against opposition in high quarters so as to protect officers who were threatened with unfair treatment. As an instance of this, his last words to me were, when I said goodbye to him on the eve of his departure to Russia: 'Remember what I have told you about — and mind you look after him.' The officer in question was then being subjected to a persecution which Lord Kitchener thought to be undeserved." There is something terribly and ironically pathetic in this anxiety for fair treatment to his officers on the part of one of the most unfairly treated of leaders. Perhaps Kitchener, who had tasted the bitter dregs of maliciously manufactured reputation, was the more anxious to spare others, even when they themselves were among his own maligners. Though what they had to malign him about, other than his peculiar personality, which seems to have had an irritating effect at close quarters, is the biggest mystery of all. Sir William Robertson's fine concluding tribute is worth quoting: "On the whole I would say that the achievements and foresight of Lord Kitchener place him in a class entirely by himself; and they justify the conclusion that no man in any of the entente countries accomplished more, if as much, to bring about the final defeat of the enemy."

If Lord Esher is less emphatic on this score, his book emanates nevertheless an impartial attitude. Unlike General Robertson, he does not so much attempt to estimate Kitchener as to state the facts of the case as clearly as possible. His "The Tragedy of Lord Kitchener" (Dutton; $3) occupies a unique niche in biographic material. His impartial presentation of the facts he knew at first hand about his subject is to be highly commended. It is the sort of book that should be written about every man worthy of a biography. If it does not itself solve the problem, it does not pretend to solve it or furnish a false solution. Lord Esher does not scorn an hiatus. Where his material stops he stops also.

All of which merely corroborates the contention already made that every man should write his own story—not necessarily his life, but rather his explanation of himself and his acts. How vastly interesting Kitchener's would be. R. G.

George Madden Martin uses in her conscientious working hours the long yellow pads that are so popular with contemporary writers. Joseph C. Lincoln uses them also, and wields a short and stubby pencil, his morning's labors being a time of good hard work. Another writer whose working hours are clearly defined is Robert W. Chambers, who uses a soft, sharply pointed pencil, and whose course is of amazing ease and rapidity.

The publication of a two-volume work on the history and construction of globes by Edward Luther Stevenson is an item of very real interest to all librarians, museums, and private collectors in this field. The work deals with the historical, geographical, and astronomical aspects of the subject and does not represent a technical discussion for globe makers. The quality and varied character of the many illustrations form one of its chief attractions. The two volumes are published by the Yale University Press for the Hispanic Society of America.

The Indians of the Canadian north woods need never fear a Volstead invasion of the dominion, for their principal intoxicant is tea, says Arthur Heming, who has just published an account of a year spent with Indian hunters of the Hudson's Bay Company. The volume, entitled "The Drama of the Forest" (Doubleday, Page & Co.), is illustrated with fourteen two-color plates reproduced from Mr. Heming's oil paintings in the Royal Ontario Museum. Drinking tea, says Mr. Heming, is a dissipation with the Indian, the trappers, hunters, and runners all drink it brewed very strong. Often they become such addicts that they must stop every hour or so on the trail to brew a hot pan of the powerful stimulant.

Max Eastman declares that when he told Bernard Shaw that he was writing a book on humor Shaw advised him to go to a sanitarium. "There is no more dangerous literary symptom," he said, "than the temptation to write about wit and humor. It indicates the total loss of both." But Eastman persisted in his undertaking, and his book, "The Sense of Humor," is among the recent publications of Charles Scribner's Sons.

BRIEFER REVIEWS.

"Nancy, Her Life and Death," by Louis Dodge (Scribner; $1), is the pathetic little biography of a skye terrier written "for those who have loved and lost a dog," but which will be read with avidity by most children and all lovers of dog stories. There is something infinitely appealing in all true stories of dogs and the story of Nancy is no exception. Beginning with the acquisition of Nancy as a fluffy little puppy of a Maltese bluish hue, it relates the story of her gay little life till it was cut short so distressingly by gopher poison. The book is written with the sympathy and tenderness that one expects from a lover of animals.

"Adventures in Swaziland," by Owen Rowe O'Neil (Century; $4), is the story of Dr. O'Neil's life with the Swazi tribe. Owen O'Neil is the son of a former minister of finance in the cabinet of Oom Paul Kruger. His family helped to found the Orange Free State and as pioneers survived the hardships and savage warfare of South Africa. O'Neil's earliest playmates were Kaffir boys and he did not wear civilized clothes till the age of nine. But the book narrates his relations with the savage Swazis, a nation of 300,000 people, who under the leadership of Bunu were a constant menace to surrounding Boer villages. Oom Paul had to pay Bunu in gin to keep the peace. After the old king died, the Swazis were ruled by the aged and blind queen mother until 1918. Dr. O'Neil describes the civil war that was waged when Sebuga, the crown prince, claimed his rights. The book is profusely illustrated with photographs of Swaziland.

The Macmillan Company has been very obliging lately in publishing beautiful new editions of standard works—the latest being Dana's "Two Years Before the Mast." Young people are seldom attracted to a book unless it has striking illustrations. And the present edition looks as if it had been gotten out to fill that juvenile need. At any rate, every one, young or old, will find the book more attractive for Charles Pears' vivid and numerous sea pictures.

"Mexico and Its Reconstruction," by Chester Lloyd Jones (Appleton; $3.50), aims to sketch the more important factors that will have to be dealt with by those who guide the destinies of Mexico in the trying period of reconstruction which is to follow the revolution. It sets out the influences that foreign capital and enterprise have had in the development of Mexican resources, the attitude that the local government has adopted toward such influences, and the position that foreign governments should adopt toward the properties their citizens have acquired within the Mexican republic.

of the philosopher, and translated by Caroline V. Kerr, is published in a limited edition by Boni & Liveright. In her foreword Elizabeth Nietzsche says that she has often been asked to assemble the papers bearing on the Nietzsche-Wagner friendship—which Nietzsche himself called the most important relationship of his life—and their quarrel. There has been a great deal rumored about the nature of the quarrel, which was essentially simple in itself, as the letters now published show. And every one's literary curiosity may now be satisfied that it was so. Nietzsche has been called the intellectual author of the great war. It is true that he alone among nineteenth-century thinkers pointed out that universal anarchy was the inevitable consequence of the general trend of modern ideas, and in his teachings there is to be found a creative, constructive, and irresistible answer to the present tendency toward nihilism and anarchy.

Another volume of Nietzsche's letters is edited by the English scholar, Dr. Oscar Levy, also called forth by the seventieth anniversary of Nietzsche's birth. "The Selected Letters of Friedrich Nietzsche" (Doubleday, Page & Co.) reveal not so much the superman as the Nietzsche that was known to his mother, sister, and a very few intimate friends. They picture the frolics and worries of the school-boy, his enthusiasm for Wagner, his youthful scholastic triumphs, and then later, the old man forsaken by his friends, hated, misunderstood, publishing his books with his own money for a public which cared nothing for them or him, and finally his friendship with Brandes and his recognition by the world.

A book that fills a particular want is the one-volume "History of English Philosophy," by W. R. Sorley (Putnam's). Not only is its compactness a novelty in authentic works of philosophy, but Dr. Sorley has treated his material in a refreshingly novel way. The aim of the present volume is to express the essential contribution of English thinkers to philosophy from its origins in English literature to the present. The book as it now appears is based upon a series of chapters contributed to "The Cambridge History of English Literature."

The new edition of Morris Jastrow's "The Song of Songs" (Lippincott; $3) is practically a new book, since it is a fresh translation based on a revised text and is accompanied by a history of the growth of these biblical love songs, together with an interpretation. Analogies with the love songs of ancient Egypt and of modern Arabic poetry are suggested by Professor Jastrow in his historical study of the songs. This book is a companion volume to the "Gentle Cynic" and to the "Book of Job." The author has chosen these three books of the Bible for popular presentation because of their human appeal and great literary significance.

An unusually brilliant novel, and incidentally a "first novel," is "Aaron West," by John Knittel (Doran; $2), a Swiss who writes, like Conrad and Maartens, in English in preference to his mother tongue. "Aaron West" is a novel of the sea, of the tropics, of England, and of an unusual theme. The last is briefly the power of the sea for those who belong to it over all human relations. Mr. Knittel writes with remarkable power and beauty and his character of Aaron West is one of the strongest personalities in modern fiction, at least. John Knittel was born in India, educated in Switzerland, and established himself in England at eighteen. He has made his home there since, though with frequent interruption for travel abroad.

Importance of Newspapers.

No more comprehensive definition of the purpose of a newspaper, no clearer definition of its duties, no fairer statement of its great service to the public has ever been given than by Justice Fisher of the Chicago Circuit Court in his decision in favor of the Chicago Tribune in the libel suit brought against it in the name of the city of Chicago (says the Sacramento Union). In reality, politicians who resented the fearless exposé of the weaknesses of the municipal government by the Tribune brought the suit. Here is Justice Fisher's concise statement on the purposes and duties of the modern newspapers:

"The press has become the eyes and ears of the world, and to a great extent brings humanity in contact with all its parts. It is the spokesman of the weak and the appeal of the suffering. It holds up for review the acts of our officials and of those men in high places who have it in their power to advance peace or endanger it. It is the force which unifies public sentiment. But for it the acts of public benefactors would go unnoticed, impostors would continue undismayed, and public office would be the rich reward of the unscrupulous demagogue."

Can one picture in what a condition of chaos the world would be today but for the untrammeled and loyal press of America during the recent great conflict? Perhaps today we would be vassals of a German overlord, our great wealth confiscated and our liberty a thing of the past, but for the newspapers. Without the press, it is doubtful if the present Armament Conference could have ever been called. Can you picture how many families would go hungry and ragged at the holiday seasons but for the appeals made in their behalf by newspapers? One could continue on indefinitely reciting what the press means to the people of today. But there is no need; Justice Fisher has said it all in those few words quoted above.

Take what relates to the body as far as the bare use warrants—as meat, drink, raiment, house, and servants. But all that makes for show and luxury reject.—Epictetus.

RUSSIAN OPERA.

Evidently the circumstances preceding the American tour of the Russian Grand Opera Company, together with their nationality, has mightily interested the public, for on Monday night the Columbia Theatre was full from pit to dome. There were so many Russians among the groups that lingered in the foyer, and out on the sidewalk, after the performance was over, that probably a very large contingent of our presumably small Russian colony turned out to listen to native opera.

And native opera it certainly was. For Tschaiowsky composed the score, the story of "Pique Dame" is taken from one of the tales of Pushkin, the famous Russian novelist, the troupe of singers is Russian, and so are the principal players in the orchestra. The opera is sung in Russian, and during two or three spoken soliloquies we had an excellent opportunity to sample the aural flavor of the Russian tongue.

Some long-headed personage who realizes the advertising power of the composite nationality of the organization is behind it (Impresario Frederoff, probably); and efficiency is shown in the general production.

We learned from the papers that the troupe fled from the Bolsheviks, leaving costumes and scenery behind them. Nevertheless the long-headed personage aforesaid has seen to it that the American tour has begun with the necessary equipment of new costumes. Pink and blue were the dominating colors worn by the ladies in "Pique Dame." They bore upon them the stamp of the American costumer. Pity we couldn't have passed upon the costumes worn in Russia, although possibly these were approximately modeled on them.

The sets were just the conventional painted background; possibly supplied here in town. But they were wholly adequate.

The singers are probably the rank and file of an original Petrograd or Moscow troupe. There are no pronounced personalities, remarkable beauties, or wonderful players in the group, although they all play with sufficient fervor to carry the theatrically tragic story well. They are a clear-featured group, principals and chorus both; the men, however, with their fine carriage and bearing and well-set-up figures, being noticeably handsomer than the women, nearly every one of whom is almost disfigured by poor make-up and a disastrous over-use of black around the eyes.

The voices are very good; ample, strong, resonant. Again I am compelled to say the men's particularly. Individual excellence among the men stood out higher than that of the women, the best of whom I considered to be Ina Buiskaya, whose mezzo-soprano voice was heard in the rôle of the aged countess, and who in the single solo, "Memories," showed superior ability over the two other woman principals in voice control and the tender shading which results in the expression of emotion.

Marie Mashir, who sang the soprano rôle of Lisa, has an exceeding abundance of volume and richness of tone. But her voice is not smooth enough wholly to please the ear. nor has the singer the art to make its full but rigid tone sufficiently flexible when need rises.

Something of the same characteristic could be remarked in the full, strong, contralto voice of Vala Valentinova, so that when the pair sang the duet, "It Is Already Night," their voices did not blend smoothly.

Marie Mashir, however, rose to much greater heights in her final scene, when Lisa voices her sorrow and apprehension as she waits for her lover on the banks of the Neva, which is to be her watery grave. Please forgive the expression. The opera is of the kind that lends itself to archaic terms, although I believe it is only thirty years old.

Of the men, Vladimir Danilov, in the tenor rôle of Hermann, revealed himself as a graceful stage figure, a fervent and impetuous actor, and the owner of a fine tenor within certain limitations; for he was apparently not up to producing those silver high Cs with which obscure Italian opera singers have so often thrilled San Franciscans in the joyful past, when stray Italian troupes from Mexico and South America were persuasively lured our way during the operatic heyday of the Tivoli.

Vladimir Radeyev, or Redeev, as it is variously spelled, won greater encomiums than the tenor, in spite of considerably lessened opportunities to make a hit in his lesser rôle, because of the agreeable smoothness and mellowness of his musically lyric baritone.

Another and a deeper baritone voice was enjoyed in the rôle of Tomsy, sung by M. Lukin, another handsome and commanding presence. Tomsy is a sort of Mercutio among the gay, gossiping young officers in the story, and M. Lukin acted the rôle with the vivacity of a Frenchman and, when need arose—for the singer had a long and dramatic recital to make, which included the story of the ominous three cards—with vocal excellence and dramatic fervor.

The story of "Pique Dame"—which, Englished, is "The Queen of Spades," the nickname of the gambling old countess famed for her luck—is taken from the romance of an older day. Nowadays our modern operas do not have ghosts to help along the action. One can understand the opera appealing to the sombre Russian taste. For, though the Russians seem to be an eminently cheerful and social people, their taste for all things bearing on the arts seems to incline strongly toward the sombre.

Tschaiowsky's score is characteristic in its congenial rendering of the supernatural and of woe and despair, and there are many striking passages of the kind. Gloom, though, is not the word one would use, as the music is too dramatic and fiery in its setting to certain scenes to leave an impression of gloom. Also, the musical expression of the sorrow of the lovers, whom destiny seeks to sever in life, is relieved by the scene in Lisa's rooms, when her youthful mates give themselves over to merriment and girlish mischief, and the later one at the barracks, in which the young officers similarly enjoy social gayety.

It is easy to understand the absence of "Pique Dame" from the repertoire followed in American opera houses. It is essentially Russian in spirit, and the story has no universal application, not even romantically. In Russia the young aristocrats are driven by idleness to gamble for large sums, and there are many novels and stories in Russian fiction bearing upon this expensive vice.

Here in America, however, since gambling does not figure so largely on the social horizon except as a diversion which is managed so shrewdly that players get stung but not ruined, we have little association with sorrow and despair in connection with gambling.

The rôle of Hermann, the uncomfortably luckless young wooer of "Pique Dame's" granddaughter, appeals therefore only moderately to the sympathies of an American audience, especially as the young man seemed to have an inordinate and melodramatic taste for flourishing pistols. But we are immensely lucky to have this opportunity to sample Russian operatic art. For we are promised another Tschaiowsky opera, one by Dargomij-sky, and one by that Russian Titan, Rimsky-Korsakov. Besides the Russian operas that have never been sung in this city—and some of them never in this country—we will have opportunity to sample the vocal and instrumental art of the Russians in more familiar works: "Carmen," "Romeo and Juliet," "Lakme," and others.

That Americans take very kindly to Russian opera seemed to be very plain on the opening night, for the capacity audience warmly applauded number after number, and singer after singer, with noticeable enthusiasm, and insisted on giving a salvo of greeting applause to the leader, Eugen Feurst, at each reappearance, although that brisk and capable wielder of the baton was probably feeling very critical of some of the results of blending the work of insufficiently rehearsed San Francisco musicians with that of his own players.

They say of the Russians that nationally they are a songful lot. And a marked characteristic of this troupe is the amplitude of their voices. Not one but has a strong, full voice. This was remarked even in the most minor rôles. As with the South Sea Islanders, whose voices, when heard by tourists, seem to be untiring and untired after many continuous hours of song, the national diversion of the Russians seems to develop the national voice.

"GETTING MARRIED."

In this play, which is thoroughly packed with conversational Shawisms, the Irish dramatist makes the usual jabs at British conservatism, British conventionality, and British hypocrisy as applied to the institution of marriage. The play begins in the atmosphere of an impending wedding, the arrangement of the necessary details of which is placed in the competent hands of a neighboring greengrocer of soothing manners and so much natural sagacity that he has recently become an alderman. Collins, the greengrocer in question, with his command of any situation in which he figures, his mellow toleration for human frailty, and his soothing habit of pouring advisory oil on troubled waters, recalls William in "You Never Can Tell," of whom he is really another edition. Would that we had here in America greengrocers or dry grocers, or any kind of grocers, or any kind of domestic tradesmen, whom we could confidently call in with the comfortable sense of reliance experienced by Mrs. Bridgenorth, and hand over to him the running of any such upsetting social function as a reception, a wedding, or a christening. Fortunately the funeral directors attend to the last earthly function that concerns us, but we need other directors to run us, as Collins ran the Bridgenorth wedding.

The fact that a wedding impends is used by Shaw as a lever for the airing of various of his theories concerning marriage through the lips of his characters; Lesbia Grantham, for instance, who gives voice to the yearning of many a spinster for motherhood without wifehood. There are many equally unconventional aspirations voiced by other characters, as when Leo feels a desire to stick to her present husband and marry another one contemporaneously; a desire, no doubt, experienced by many ladies of liberal and expansive nature.

Shaw amuses himself by making this most lawless lady the most easily shocked of the group when any one departs from stereotype and utters a rebellious sentiment. And similarly he takes an especially impish delight in making that extremely nice old bishop utter home truths in his gentle, refined tone, and inferentially point out to the stumbling human being his own follies.

"Getting Married" is really, one might say, the dramatization of a polemic pamphlet for curing humanity of its errors and misconceptions and injustices toward married folk and matrimony. Leo is tired of hearing her husband repeat himself with boring frequency, and the bishop gently intimates that every man is a phonograph with half a dozen records, and that each one is bound to repeat these records until the most frequent listener—who is generally the wife—knows them by heart.

At a certain stage in the play I suddenly recognized the familiar Shavian attitude. The dramatist, giving rein to his tendency for controversy, ceases to dramatize. All action halts, the plot rests, and the characters make themselves comfortable, and then proceed to quarrel, discuss, and argue, several of them monopolizing the floor and pouring forth the usual Shaw witticisms.

Shaw, however, is clever enough to stimulate suspense and expectation by keeping one character in reserve. This is Mrs. George, a lady who belongs to trade, since she is the greengrocer's sister-in-law. She is also the wife of the mayor in the town in which the play is located. But notwithstanding these thoroughly prosaic adjuncts, Mrs. George is that rare object—if you can call it an object—a Shaw symbol. What she really stands for is a little mystifying, but it seems to be that wanderlust which is apt to attack people apparently safely imprisoned in the wedded state. For Mrs. George is in the habit of indulging in periodic excursions into the world beyond matrimonial domesticity, in order to follow up some idealizing dream which has captured her imagination. We are thus permitted to see the lady waking out of one of her dreams and incontinently plunging into another.

There is something of the lawless fabric of Candida's soul in the essence of this woman, who is partly poetic, partly prosaic, and wholly amusing.

Of the dozen people necessary to represent the characters in the play, only three impersonations stood out particularly; those of the bishop, of Collins, and of Mrs. George.

Mr. John Fee's bishop was quite a charming presentation in its gentleness, its refinement, its genial astuteness, and its quiet humor. Mr. Fee, in giving to features and coloring the characteristics of middle age, contrived also to lend to his appearance the thinker's asceticism, and a delicate grace of spirituality and refinement.

Conversely, Mr. Maitland did something or other to the bridge of his shapely nose which gave to his usually admirable profile the plebeian outlines appropriate to that of a greengrocer, whose genial humanity he feelingly conveyed.

Lea Penman had a congenial rôle as Mrs. George, whose widely varied moods gave the leading lady an excellent opportunity to portray sparkling animation, the easily stirred wrath of a fascinating termagant, and a strange mood of fantasy and spiritual divination.

Dorothy Wetmore was appropriately spitzery as Edith, Rupert Drum, except for a lack of intrinsic humor, dealt fairly satisfactorily with the rôle of a philanderer, and four or five others, including one or two new arrivals, handled the remaining rôles. I think I foresee a speedy departure of the rather snippily-mannered young thing who misplayed Leo, and I cordially invite Mr. Maitland to come down hard with both feet on the mental corns of that walking piece of youthful naïveté who represented the young bridegroom every time that he says "merried" for married.

JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

Daniel Drew was a Western drover. Before driving his stock to market the wily cattleman would feed salt in large quantities to the animals to make them thirsty. They would drink so plentifully that their weight was much increased. When put on the scales and sold they "fetched" materially more. To this chicanery on the part of that obscure ranchman the world owes the phrase "watered stock."

Let the incommunicable objects of nature and the metaphysical isolation of man teach us independence. Let us not be too much acquainted. . . . We should meet each morning, as from foreign countries, and spending the day together, should depart at night, as into foreign countries. . . . No degree of affection need invade this religion. This is myrrh and rosemary to keep the other sweet.

—Emerson.

The Columbia Theatre.

The Russian Grand Opera Company at the Columbia Theatre has achieved a triumph with its repertoire of new works and a limited number of old favorites. There remains another week to the engagement, which comes to a close on Sunday night, January 15th. The various principals with the organization have proved their worth in the operas thus far sung and some big sensations are promised during the remainder of the engagement.

Sunday night, January 8th, will see the first presentation here of the Napravink opera, "Dubrovsky." Another new work for San Francisco, and in fact the United States, is "The Tsar's Bride," to be sung on Monday night and at the Saturday matinee. "Pique Dame" will be offered for the last time on Tuesday night, and on Wednesday Massenet's

"Thais" will attract a big house. Dargomizsky's "The Mermaid" is to be staged on Thursday, and "Dubrovsky" will be repeated on Friday. A novelty will be found in the Saturday night production of Rubinstein's "The Demon," and great interest is manifested in the announcement that "Boris Godonoff" will close the engagement on Sunday.

The Maitland Playhouse.

"The Liars," a comedy of social life by Henry Arthur Jones, considered by many his best play, will be seen at the Maitland Playhouse this coming week, commencing next Monday evening.

"The Liars" was the vehicle so successfully used in this country by John Drew, and Charles Wyndham starred in the same play in London. It is a cleverly written drama and can not fail to please the Maitland audiences. It will be the first presentation of this play in San Francisco.

Shaw's "Getting Married," likewise never before offered on the Pacific Coast, will continue for the remainder of this week, closing with the Saturday matinee and evening performances. It has made a hit with the audiences that frequent the Stockton Street theatre and is rated as popular as any of the Shaw productions.

The Players Club.

The Players Club, which opens Friday night with Moliere's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," is probably the first theatre in the country to celebrate in a fitting manner the tercentenary of the greatest of French dramatists. There are many tragedies in the theatre of Moliere, but this an anniversary best celebrated with gayety and mirth. Was it not Kemble who said: "Moliere belongs to no nation, but one day the god of comedy, wishing to write, became a man, and happened to fall into France"? Moliere, who was a polished gentleman of the seventeenth century and a great artist, did not fear that wisdom would perish in the midst of buffoonery nor that philosophy would die in pantomime.

In "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" we have a comedy with a moral. Moliere's aim in this play is to amuse us by depicting things as they are. The immortal Jourdain is drawn for us with all his foibles and duality of character. Whether Moliere aimed to cure men of their foibles by this exposure is still a debated question.

Director Regnaud Travers announces that the title-role will be played by Carl Kroenke. He will be supported by such competent active members of the club as Hilda Deni-ville, Ernest Clewe, Virginia Sciaroni, and Ben Purrington. A corps of ballet dancers under the direction of Katharine Edson will enliven the interludes. The responsibility for the settings and the music is in the hands of George Edwards and Gerstle Mack, the music and the art directors, respectively, of the theatre.

The Orpheum.

Sallie Fisher in Clare Kummer's comedy, "The Choir Rehearsal," has scored an unqualified hit. Miss Kummer is the author of "Good Gracious Annabelle" and "A Successful Calamity," in which William Gillette has appeared. Miss Kummer and Miss Fisher enjoy their present association, because it was one of Miss Kummer's songs, "Dearie," that Miss Fisher sang to fame and helped to bring Miss Fisher favorable attention.

Fred Lindsay, the famous Australian rancher and big game hunter and veteran of two wars, is a headline feature next week. He is one of the most expert manipulators of the stock whip in the Antipodes. He owns a five-thousand-acre ranch in Saskatchewan, Canada. During the war he commanded a squadron of Australian bushmen with considerable personal credit, and in the succeeding years his time was divided between big game and concession hunting in various parts of the world, farming, and vaudeville.

Frank Kellam and Patricia O'Dare's particular specialty is chasing blues, with an original assortment of singing, talking, and dancing. They make blues chasing an entertaining theatrical sport.

Charles De Haven and Freddie Nice just can't make their feet behave. These two boys are representative eccentric dancers. Their pedal evolutions have been of material assistance to various comedies and have given them a high standing in vaudeville.

Frank Farron is a dealer in laughs. He is a funny fellow, a genuine comedian, and he has a monologue full of good songs and good stories, and the result is that this dealer in laughs has plenty of customers.

Johnny Muldoon and Pearl Franklyn offer their terpsichorean tactics with the assistance of a male associate. Their efforts they call "A Revelry of Song, Dance, and Music," and it proves an attractive combination.

The Ruth Howell Duo are America's premiere aerialists. Stunts of the most hazardous aviator are child's play compared with the feats this duo accomplish.

Eddie Foy has been in vaudeville for a long time, but at no previous visit has he had as funny or so enjoyable an act as his present Fun Revue. This laugh riot remains another week.

May Robson Coming.

Patrons of the Columbia Theatre will no doubt welcome the news that May Robson's new play is a dramatization of Nina Wilcox Putnam's stories which have appeared in the Saturday Evening Post, and is entitled "It Pays to Smile," a comedy in three acts, the work of Ethel Watts Mumford.

Augustus Pitou, Inc., under whose banner Miss Robson has been appearing for the past several years, has surrounded his clever star with one of the best supporting companies she has ever hand, and given the play an excellent mounting. If the out-of-town reports and reviews of the play and company can be taken as a criterion local theatre-goers have a treat in store for their amusement on Monday, January 16th.

The Pacific Players.

The Pacific Players announce their next periodical production for after the holidays, comprising "Sunset" by Jerome K. Jerome, author of "The Passing of the Third Floor Back," and a Smart Set piece by Winthrop Parkhurst. Nathaniel Anderson will again be the director of the performance.

Arthur Maitland announces that he has secured from the Actors' Guild of New York City that exceptionally successful drama, "Jane Cleg," written by St. John G. Ervine. "Jane Cleg" has been more widely discussed than most of the recent New York plays and a splendid opportunity will be afforded San Franciscans in the near future to witness the same.

One is not profane who "doesn't give a dam." A dam was a small Hindu coin at a time when the English came to India. The phrase sprang into use to signify that a matter was of no consequence. The term "tinker's dam," also, is not spelled damn. It is a piece of coarse cloth used by a tinsmith to hold hot solder from running. The phrase "not worth a rap" is likewise numismatic in origin.

For a rap was an Irish copper coin issued early in the eighteenth century to supply a long-felt want for small money. Nominally it was worth a half-penny, but its metal was so thin and base that it never passed for more than a farthing.

Clothes have been said to make the man and fine feathers, fine birds. It is generally granted that clothes have a psychology of their own. Women are said to feel superior in furs and jewels, but that may be merchants' propaganda. A man prefers not to be clothes-conscious. However, the importance of clothes psychology is not so much for the wearer as for the beholder. Mr. Mark Sullivan has commented on the distressing habit— from the aesthetic point of view—of Orientals adopting Western garb. It is an indubitable fact that their national costume is more becoming to the Japanese and Chinese than Western styles are. And yet we suspect the Orientals of a deeper psychology in their own interests. Granted that Mme. Wellington Koo's statuesque beauty would be enhanced by Chinese costume—and we are not quite sure that it could be—may it not be that she and her husband and the other Orientals in diplomatic service have designs deeper than mere personal effect? Mr. Sullivan thinks the Chinese delegation would be more effective in national costume. From the point of view of a poster designer they would be—that is to say from the aesthetic viewpoint. But the Oriental mind is both aesthetic and subtle, and we suspect it of subtlety in the present instance. If the representatives of the Western countries in this or any other diplomatic conference were confronted by Asiatics in costumes that date back a thousand years with little change, they would have a constant reminder of Kipling's couplet before them:

East is East and West is West
And never the twain shall meet.

Curiously enough, the Oriental physique is more like ours than their dress is. And the only essential difference between minds is that the Oriental's is more reflective and less frivolous and therefore more subtle. For subtlety is not a peculiar mental character, but the result of practice in thinking. So the Chinese and Japanese delegates may not be so far off as first blush reveals them. "Clothes make the man" one can hear them say in fancied argument. It is our own phrase, not theirs. After all, why should there not be a diplomatic dress as well as a diplomatic language? Whatever else the art of diplomacy is for, it is nothing if not a leveler of differences.

It is now asserted by a reverend gentleman that jazz music is as intoxicating as whisky. We have not heard that many devotees of the latter have corroborated the ecclesiastical dictum, but for our own part we should rejoice to see a prohibition campaign launched against jazz music and will even become ardent prohibitionists ourselves. Marion Cox says in an interesting discussion of music that all music is immoral—for precisely the reason that the Rev. Herbert Smith says it is immoral—because it is intoxicating. Though it is a bit hard to see oneself being intoxicated by, say, a Bach fugue. Miss Cox really should have drawn the line at some kinds of music. But both she and the Rev. Smith have the right idea. It is revolutionary, but it is right. Music, some of it anyway, is immoral. As for the most recent reform movement—jazz, if it can be called music at all, is worse than immoral. It is criminal. The reformers really have justified their existence, after all. One would be willing to be pretty generally reformed—to live the life of one's most reformed and reforming Puritan ancestors—if only jazz would go by the board. We repeat—jazz music is worse than intoxicating. In fact we have never found it anywhere intoxicating—worse luck. It has not even that excuse for its viciousness. But it is conducive to crime and the sooner it is abolished, the sooner will we hail the reformer as a true deliverer.

Another chapter of reform as mapped by a would-be blue-lawyer whose name we happily forget is a very sweeping programme for social amusements. Our particular reformer is not against amusement per se, but against the sort of amusement that is prevalent. He would replace the dance and cabaret with home parties of the spelling-bee order. Games of the most contactless sort are recommended. Blind man's buff, one imagines, would be ruled out. It would be so easy for that to degenerate into rough house and thence it is an easy step to a modern fashionable party. Not being acquainted with the names of games of a simon pure variety we are limited in giving our reformer's programme in toto. But we have suggested the main outlines. In fancy we are already constructing a new social order. Imagine a scene, say, at the British Embassy in Washington. Sir Auckland Geddes—since he is a professor to boot—would make an excellent captain for one side of the spelling match. The other team could be handled by Mr. Hoover, who has shown his executive ability admirably in other fields of endeavor. The remaining guests could compete; and if it were thought invidious to test the orthographic knowledge of these dignitaries in English, they might still compete by brushing up their less familiar branches of knowledge—Japanese, for instance. This wholesome entertainment could doubtless be varied by others equally vivacious. Unfortunately our own imagination is flooded at the end of the spelling bee. But we respectfully submit the idea to Eastern hosts who are entertaining the Conference delegates—admitting, of course, that it is not original with us, but comes from a social reformer of the true blue dye. Emerson wrote that "simple hearts play their own play in innocent defiance of the blue laws of the world." Maybe, in Emerson's time. Nowadays it takes both a crafty and courageous heart to "play its own play." Nowadays we must play "Authors" or "Farmer in the Dell."

New York club women have solved the problem of unsuitable Christmas presents by the simple expedient of "swapping parties." This device has been long practiced by youngsters, but somewhere in the borderland between childhood and maturity most people develop what they are pleased to call sentiment and sensibility—hazy qualities that nevertheless have a powerful hold on most of us. It is a courageous adult who will fly in the face of the twin emotional illusions. And evidently the members of the Women's City Club are courageous in the extreme. The strangest thing about it was that there were actually sentimental people in New York to protest. One doesn't associate sentimentality and New York clubs, especially of the feminine persuasion.

I could better eat with one who did not respect the truth or the laws than with a sloven or unrepresentable person. Moral qualities rule the world, but at short distances the senses are despotic.—Emerson.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

"It will always seem strange to us," says Colonel George Bailey, "that a man will roar at a one-cent tax on a lemonade and almost want to kiss the bootlegger who soaks him to the tune of $16 a quart for hooch."

A Scotch laborer was slipping out of the yard during working hours to wet his whistle when he ran into the boss: "Hallo!" said the latter pleasantly, "were you looking for me?" "Ay," replied Sandy, "I wis lookin' for ye, but I didna want tae find ye."

In a small country school, during a recess period, the teacher in charge of the playground saw one of the boys about seven years old strike one of the girls. "Norman," said the teacher, "no gentleman would strike a lady." After careful thought the boy replied: "Well, no lady would tickle a gentleman."

Two Scotchmen were on a raft adrift on a stormy sea. Angus knelt and began to pray. "O Lord," he said, "I ken I've broken maist o' Thy commandments. But, O Lord, if I'm spared this time I promise—!" Here Andrew interrupted him. "I widna commit yersel' ower far, Angus," said he. "I think I see land."

Lord Babbington was instructing a new colored servant in his duties, adding, "Now, Zeke, when I ring for you, you must answer me by saying, 'My lord, what will you have?'" A few hours afterward, having occasion to summon the servant, his lordship was astonished with the following: "My Gawd, whut does you want now?"

The late George Loane Tucker, the movie pioneer, was noted in Los Angeles for his fastidious tastes. Mr. Tucker was lunching one day in a Los Angeles restaurant, and at a nearby table sat a movie king whose table manners left much to be desired. The man ate his soup in a specially noisy manner. Eating away, he leaned towards Mr. Tucker and said: "This is durn good soup, George." "It sounds good," Mr. Tucker replied.

The jury in a capital case listened to the learned charge of the judge and solemnly retired. Two hours later they filed slowly back in charge of a constable, and great was the feelings of suppressed excitement in the courtroom. "Gentlemen of the jury," said the sombre judge, breaking a silence that was almost painful in its intensity, "have you agreed on a verdict?" "Yes, your honor," was the impressive response of the foreman, "the jury are all of one mind—temporary insanity."

It was the same old story. Mrs. Newlywed's cake was simply impossible to eat, and hubby told her so. "Please remember that you did not wed a cook," says Mrs. Newlywed haughtily. That night when they had both retired a distinct, suspicious rattling of furniture was heard. "Jim! Jim!" exclaimed Mrs. Newlywed. "Get up at once! I'm sure there are burglars in the house." "Get up yourself," came the muttered reply from beneath the blankets. "You didn't marry a policeman."

Brown had what he thought was a clever idea to stave off an unwelcome visit from his mother-in-law. "My dear," he said to Mrs. B., "you have asked me to do two things. One is to give you a new fall suit and the other to send to your mother a check to defray her traveling expenses. I can't afford to do both. Which shall it be?" Her reply showed how foolish he was to match his wits against hers. "Send mother the check, by all means," she said quickly. "I've already ordered the suit."

The crew of a United States ship went ashore in a Chinese port to place a wreath upon the grave of a shipmate who had been buried there on a previous trip. When the ceremony had been performed, and the men were getting ready to return to the ship, one of them saw a Chinaman placing a bowl of rice on another grave near by. "Hey, John, how long do you think it will be before your friend comes up to eat the rice?" he asked. "Allee same long time your friend come up to smell flowers," the Chink replied.

A country schoolma'am was examining her pupils for the benefit of the members of the school board. The youngsters went through their paces nervously and did fairly well until the teacher asked the question, "Who wrote 'Hamlet'?" There was a lull of exhaustion and no one answered. She asked again, and this time a bit more sternly: "Who wrote 'Hamlet'?" Little Johnny Jones piped up defensively, "Please, teacher, I didn't." "Ha, ha!" Director Blank chuckled aloud. "The little skeesicks! I'll bet he did."

When the late General Horace Porter was manager of the Pullman Company an army officer wrote him saying that the Pullman car that had carried him from Jersey City to Long Branch had not been properly swept and dusted. General Porter waste-basketed the letter; also the second, the third and the fourth. But the fifth was so violent that General Porter dictated the following reply: "Sir—We have run the train off the track, burned the cars, shot the conductor, hanged the porter, and discontinued the line. Hoping that this will be satisfactory, I remain," etc.

The minister of a Scottish country parish, whose estimate of himself was not of the lowliest type, had accepted a call to a wider sphere, and was paying a few farewell visits. "So ye're gaun tae leave us," said one of the oldest of his female parishioners, as he sat down. "What will we dae noo?" "Oh, Mrs. Macfarlane," replied the minister in affable tones, "you'll soon get a far better man!" "'Deed, sir," came the despondent rejoinder, "I hae my doots. We've had five in my time, and every one o' them has been wurs than the last!"

Two friends reached Waterloo Station, London, only to find that one of them had missed his last train home. The other, who lived in the Weybridge district, was more fortunate, and insisted upon taking his friend along with him. "You mustn't mind a walk, old chap," he said, as they left Weybridge station. "My house is a good mile away." "Lead on," said his companion, and they footed it together. It was a bad night, raining in torrents, and they did the first three-quarters of a mile in comparative silence. Suddenly the host halted. "What's up, old boy!" inquired his friend. "Up!" retorted the other. "I forgot. We moved to Reigate yesterday."

Ballade of Missing Signs.

Nay, tell me in what land of shade
Are found the signs I used to see,
Aligned by fence or rock or glade,
Or tacked on some wild forest tree,
That told of gin or good whiskey,
From mountain peak to shining mere.
Where are those tokens bright and free?
Gone are the signs of yesteryear?

Where's Johnny Walker's body laid?
That colored man, Green River's plea?
And where's the bottle Carstairs made
From San Antonio to Zuyder Zee?
High on what wall of masonree
Does That's All Wilson spray with fear?
What memories come back to me,
Gone are the signs of yesteryear!

Where's Bass or Burton, undismayed;
That bubbled in far days of glee?
And Overholt, that gallant blade,
Or good King William, V.O.P.?
Where can that Boar's Head label be,
That drove from banquets gloom or fear,
Those Bitters that staved off D.T.?
Gone are the signs of yesteryear!

ENVOI.

Ah, Hunter, I have watched and prayed
O'er meadow bars, to sage and seer;
Nor answer found with staff or spade,
Gone are the signs of yesteryear!

—J. J. Mehan in Judge.

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

Cycol will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of Cycol as shown on the Cycol Recommendation Chart. Use Associated gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

CURRENT VERSE.

When Foch Passed By.

What we saw when Foch passed by?
Only a bronzed, grave leader's face,
Gentle lineaments, not one trace
Of the general bold, none dared defy,
Only this, when Foch passed by?
Nay! Beneath that cap of gold,
Behind the brain of strategist cold,
The Spirit of Knighthood, long since dead,
Spoke! Godfrey—Roland, Louis the Saint,
These were his peers—alive once more!
And when Foch prayed within the door
Of St. Vibia yesterday—
Here in Los Angeles, far away
From scarred, spent Europe tottering, faint—
His prayer was lit from a Torch that burns
Wherever the Spirit of Freedom years:
It was lighted in Palestine centuries past;
From St. Denis crusaders came,
Knelt at Christ's sepulchre, caught the flame
That is still alive, yet may not last,
Unless we lift the Torch on high—
The Torch Foch left, when he passed by!
—Nancy K. Foster.

Ballade by the Fire.

Slowly I smoke and hug my knee,
The while a witless masquerade
Of things that only children see
Floats in a mist of light and shade:
They pass, a flimsy cavalcade,
And with a weak, reminding glow,
The falling embers break and fade,
As one by one the phantoms go.

Then, with a melancholy glee
To think where once my fancy strayed,
I muse on what the years may be
Whose coming tales are all unsaid,
Till tongs and shovel, snugly laid
Within their shadowed niches, grow
By grim degrees to pick and spade,
As one by one the phantoms go.

But then, what thought the mystic Three Around me ply their merry trade?
And Charon soon may carry me
Across the gloomy Stygian glade?—
Be up, my soul; nor be afraid
Of what some unborn year may show;
But mind your human debts are paid,
As one by one the phantoms go.

ENVOY.

Life is the game that must be played:
This truth at least, good friends, we know;
So live and laugh, nor be dismayed
As one by one the phantoms go.
—Edwin Arlington Robinson.

In the Tender Irish Weather.

Oh! the calm, brown mountain and the endless miles of heather,
And the rugged, grave horizon where the white clouds roll;
And my cheek against the soft cheek of the tender Irish weather,
And in all the space around me not a soul—not a soul!

There the skylark and the blackbird and the linnet sing together.

With ne'er a one to still them nor human voice to speak—
Oh! 'tis long since I have lulled me in the tender
Irish weather,
And my heart is hot within me for the touch of her cheek!

But they say that on the mountain where I've lain among the heather,
With the plover's note a-mourning thro' the haze of blue,
That the cold and dead are lying in the soft-checked Irish weather.

And oh! my heart is breaking for the mountain that I knew!
—Lillian Middleton in New York Times.

Unrest and Disorder in China.

The fundamental difficulty that is responsible for the unrest and disorder which now reigns supreme in Chinese political and social affairs can be traced accordingly to the appearance of foreign ideas and, what is more important, to their rampant dissemination (says Chang Hsin-Hai in the North American Review). Foreign ideas, merely because they are foreign, are not taboo; on the contrary, they should be warmly received. But differences in time and place require the exclusion of those which have no special bearing upon the Chinese people and upon their problems. The tendency in China at present unfortunately is towards taking over everything foreign—good, bad, and indifferent, with perhaps a greater attraction for the bad and the indifferent, of which there is a full supply in the treaty ports where the common people receive strictly first-hand knowledge of the rest. This is as it inevitably must be when the ideas lack control and concentration; and the ultimate result is that not only do they become dangerous catchwords which, because they are strange to the mental habits of the people, are deprived of all their original meaning and content, but they also render useless those native ideas which for centuries have formed their mental support. The Chinese mind today is, to all intents and purposes, loosened from all its moorings. It has been drifting, especially within the last ten years, whither no one knows; neither is there any group of competent men of power and influence to whom it may look for guidance, nor is it itself capable of finding definite aim to direct its endeavors. It has thus come to pass that instead of making for progress and enlightenment, these new ideas have been making for danger and turmoil.

Whitman's Ambition.

It was not until Walt Whitman was thirty-six years old that "Leaves of Grass" appeared, but many years previous, when he was twenty-one, he began to have dreams of great authorship, according to Emory Holloway, who, in a two-volume collection of the poet's fugitive work, rescues from oblivion a number of these very early writings. In one of them, Whitman, using a pseudonym, says:

"I think that if I should make pretensions to be a philosopher, and should determine to edify the world with what would add to the number of those sage and ingenious theories which do already so much abound, I would compose a wonderful and ponderous book. Therein should be treatises on the nature and peculiarities of men, the diversity of their characters, the means of improving their state and the proper mode of governing nations; with divers other points whereon I could no doubt throw quite as much light as do many of these worthy gentlemen who, to the delight and instruction of our citizens, occasionally treat on these subjects in printed periodicals, in books, and in public discourses. At the same time that I would do all this, I would carefully avoid saying anything of women, because it behooves a modest personage like myself not to speak upon a class of beings of whose nature, habits, notions, and ways he has not been able to gather any knowledge, either by experience or observation.

"Nobody, I hope, will accuse me of conceit in these opinions of my own capacity for doing great things. In good truth, I think the world suffers from this much bemoaned modesty. Who should be a better judge of a man's talents than the man himself? I see no reason why we should let our light shine under bushels. Yes; I would write a book! And who shall say it might not be a very good book? Who knows but that I might do something very respectable?"

Death of John J. Crooks.

San Rafael lost a highly respected citizen in the death of John J. Crooks, which occurred at his home on Christmas Day. Mr. Crooks had long been connected with many local activities and had borne a graceful part in the social life of the community.

Dr. Robert A. Milliken of Pasadena will deliver the fourth in a series of popular lectures on astronomy on the evening of the 13th at Native Sons Hall. Subject, "Seeing the Invisible." Dr. Milliken will describe in non-technical language how it is possible to photograph objects which the eye can never see directly and how such pictures yield new insight into the structure of the atom and into the construction of stars and nebulae.

Poor Richard's Day.

The Sons of the Revolution have set about to make a holiday of Franklin's birthday (says the New York Tribune). The governors of the states are to be petitioned for that purpose. No one will gainsay that the day which cradled Franklin, January 17, 1706, is one to be remembered.

It is awkward, however, that the great inventor, philosopher, statesman, and patriot was born in midwinter. The season is already well sprinkled with holidays. If he had seen the light in April or August the temptation to celebrate the event on links and tennis courts would be irresistible. But that would be showing inappropriate regard for Franklin, whose extreme sporting dissipation was an evening of chess, and even that gave him a qualm of conscience over wasted time.

Here is a thought: Make January 17th the kind of holiday that would have suited Benjamin himself. Let everybody work double or triple time, wear old clothes, put a couple of dollars in the bank, and meditate prayerfully on his personal shortcomings. That would be a true holiday à la Poor Richard. It would be much honored in the breach, probably.

Strange is the word saunterer, sprung from La Sainte Terre (the Holy Land), whither pilgrims were wont leisurely to journey. Stranger the word haberdasher, which is said to have been derived from the German hab' ihr das dier? Another exotic corruption, this time from the French, is qu'en dirai (what shall I say or it?) for quandary.

Our Senatorial Fit Thrower.

Senator Johnson's protest against the Four-Power agreement has failed of affirmative response. Quite significantly so. The only public attention given to it (other than by his friend Mr. Hearst) has been on the part of former associates of his politics, and in prompt and emphatic rebuttal. Mr. Kent has met it with open protest. Mr. Rowell in a smashing argument has exhibited its fallacies. In the comment of the latter there is a delicately contemptuous note; the senator, he declares, "thrashes a man of straw." Others of Mr. Johnson's erstwhile intimates in private talk speak sadly of the senator's habit of seeking in given situations, not what is worthy and constructive, but that which may yield him opportunity to exercise a contentious spirit.

In this connection Mr. Rowell, while revealing an affectionate mind toward his patron and friend, betrays the fact that he knows the weak point in the senator's armor. He likens him to the traditional quack doctor who is hell on fits: "If his patients had fits he cured them and if they had anything else he gave them fits and cured them." This comes a bit harshly from one long associated with Mr. Johnson and who upon many occasions and under varying circumstances has lent comfort and aid to the senator in his most extravagant radicalisms. Obviously Mr. Rowell has grown weary of the "fits" principle in dealing with public issues. Also obviously he prefers, in the immediate instance at least, to associate himself with those who seek beneficent effects in public policies rather than with the practice in politics based upon the propagation of "fits."

Senator Johnson is not without elements of strength. He has courage. He has the gift of tongues. He is master of an unctuous style that wins the multitude. In truth, he has many elements of power. If he could bring himself to employ his very considerable abilities in support of constructive policies he might do the state and the nation a vital service and create for himself a place in the sphere of national affairs. But he seems unable to transmute the belligerent campaigner into a constructive statesman. Encouraged by a rather notable success as a thrower of "fits" he seems unable to forego the fierce joys of conflict, to put to one side the methods that once made him a formidable campaigner, but which do not suit the character of a senator. Mr. Johnson is obviously unable to turn his face from the shabby degrees by which he did ascend.

The deficiency of Senator Johnson is that of character. His policies are founded, not in conviction and under the regulation of moral purpose, but in sheer love of acrimonious contention. He nurses and emphasizes his resentments. He plumes himself as a "fighter" and he elects to fight even under circumstances that require him to set up a man of straw as a target. It is a pity—truly a pity—that very considerable talents with opportunity of real service should be lost through the inability of their possessor to rid himself of habits of mind that are an obstruction to vital obligations and incidentally a grief to his well-wishers.

The Political Year.

In the sense that we are not to choose a President in the coming November elections this is an off-year in American politics. None the less, important determinations are to be made, the greatest being the choice of a new House of Representatives. One-third of the members of the Senate is to be chosen, but less importance attaches to this phase of the political year, due to the fact that the result as to the Senate is practically foreordained. The Senate will almost surely remain in Republican hands. As the Senate of 96 members stands, the Republicans have a majority of 24. Of the whole number (96) the terms of 32 will expire. The Republicans to go out (17) are Lodge of Massachusetts, Johnson of California, Kellogg of Minnesota, La Follette of Wisconsin, New of Indiana, Calder of New York, Hale of Maine, McCumber of North Dakota, Crow of Pennsylvania, Dupont of Delaware, Frelinghuysen of New Jersey, McLean of Connecticut, Page of Vermont, Poindexter of Washington, Sutherland of West Virginia, and Townsend of Michigan. The retiring Democrats (15) are Hitchcock of Nebraska, Pomerene of Ohio, Reed of Missouri, Williams of Mississippi, Ashurst of Arizona, Culbertson of Texas, Gerry of Rhode Island, Jones of New Mexico, Kendrick of Wyoming, King of Utah, McKellar of Tennessee, Myers of Montana, Pitman of Nevada, Swanson of Virginia, and Trammell of Florida. To win the Senate from the Republicans the Democrats would have to retain all the seats that they now hold and to gain 13 seats from the Republicans. Of course, nothing in the political world is impossible. Revolutions do now and again occur. But it is extremely improbable that so radical an exchange of senatorial seats may occur at a time of relative political quiet. It may be taken for granted that the Republicans will control the next Senate as they do the Senate that is now sitting.

But the situation with respect to the House of Representatives is of another kind. Here the whole membership (435) goes out. In the present Congress the Republicans hold 301 seats, the Democrats hold 134. The Republican majority is 167, something more than two to one. But in this great majority, since there are no hold-overs, there is no assurance. In off years it is notoriously the habit of the American electorate to act eccentrically. When the presidency is not involved party spirit and party discipline are relatively lax. The individual elector is much more likely to vote with a free hand when there is no controlling motive—or a less impelling motive—as respects the head of the government. In the immediate instance it is to be remembered that the heavy vote for Republican candidates two years ago was to a very considerable degree cast in negative spirit. The country wanted to rebuke Wilsonism. An obvious way to do it was to turn over the government, both in its executive and legislative branches, to the party then in opposition. This was done in a spirit of high expectation. It was hoped—not quite reasonably, for democracies are never reasonable—that by putting the government in hands critical of Wilsonism all the errors and all the misfortunes of the Wilson period would instantly be remedied. It was the idea of the average voter that economies would be effected, that taxes would be reduced, that conditions would swing back to the pre-war status—all upon the instant.

Of course these bright hopes have not been fulfilled in their entirety or even approximately. The mischiefs inherited by the new Congress were too many and too great for immediate remedy. The necessities of the government, not only under the extravagances of the war period, but in relation to its legitimate costs, were vast; and they must continue to be vast for many years to come. By no conceivable method can the government return to the pre-war basis until slow-moving reforms shall be achieved and until the vast debt contracted upon war account shall be paid. For many years the government must continue to pay on war account an annual sum at least equal to the normal charges of government. There is the interest on the vast public debt, there is the augmented organization essential to the carrying on of enlarged functions of government due to the war, there is the increased expenditure on military account, there is the care of disabled soldiers—these and many other things that must inevitably consume vast sums of money annually for many years to come. We shall not sooner get back to pre-war standards in government than to pre-war standards relative to the cost of other things.

Something has been done in the year since the Republicans came into control of the government for remedying the situation, but not as much as was popularly expected—indeed, not as much as was reasonably expected. Congress has been dilatory, it has lacked decisiveness in action. It is not to be denied that despite definite control of all the branches of government, much that might have been hoped for has failed of performance.

Taking the situation in all its aspects, it is difficult to find in it anything in the nature of positive assurance. The political aspect of the country is quite definitely Republican, but there are factors of disappointment both reasonable and emotional. There is the apathy characteristic of off years. Above all, the times are hard. Prices for those who have commodities to sell are low, prices for those who must buy are high. The farmer must sell his wheat, his cattle, his hides, his wool, at prices below normal. Those who buy flour, butcher's meat, shoes, and clothing still have to pay prices above normal. Labor, while a declining quantity as regards wages, is still largely above standard as regards the employer. Hard times are commonly times of political dissatisfaction; there is always universal feeling that the government is somehow to blame. Under such conditions and in off years party spirit is at ebb tide. In the coming election anything may happen.

For the thoughtful minority there are considerations in the coming election of supreme importance. It is to be borne in mind that measures of retrenchment from war expenditure, measures of reorganization, measures representing the will and the aims of the President, are in process of being carried out. These considerations logically call for such organization of Congress as may tend to support of the Executive. If Mr. Harding is to bring about results he is aiming at he should have the support of a Congress in sympathy with him and with his plans. It is to be remembered that the principle implied in the Scriptural text—a house divided against itself—applies to governmental as to other things. These considerations will undoubtedly control the more thoughtful and responsible elements of the American public. But not all are reasonable, not all are responsible.

The most hopeful aspect of the situation from the standpoint of Republican interest is the very obviously full confidence of the public in the character, the intentions, and the projects of the President. Mr. Harding is today valued in the public mind even more highly than when he took office. He has proved himself a poised, a discreet, an honest man. If he has not been able to do all that he wished to do he has done all that has been humanly possible. Further, his aims for the future are all to the good, and the American people appreciate the fact. The hope of the Republicans largely rests upon the esteem President Harding has won in the something less than a year of his presidential life.

Less popularly effective, but still a large factor in the situation, are the influences proceeding from the Washington Conference. By the government in its existing organization there has been achieved much that tends to inspire national pride. The achievements of the Conference are in direct line with the moral aspirations of the great majority of our people. There should be, and there will be, very general disposition to strengthen the hands of an Administration that has, by its initiative and its discreet employment of forces at its hand, advanced the standards of world organization and of world civilization.

"Peace, Peace, Where There Is No Peace!"

Mr. De Valera's course within the week is remindful of the nursery story which tells of the petulant little maid who, the play not going to her liking, gathers up her doll rags and runs home. Being fairly beaten after a period of discussion in which he, with all the influences he could bring to bear, was out-voted, he serves notice that he will jump the game. Also he will continue the fight under the old war cries. There are those, it is declared, who will join with him to the end of sustaining the embittered agitation that has long kept Ireland aflame and which has soaked sections of her soil with blood. All of which leads to the reflection that the first and essential qualification of a self-governing people under a representative system is the spirit that accepts and abides by majority determinations. It is this spirit that has sustained and advanced our own country through successive generations. It is the lack of it that keeps Central America and parts of South America in perpetual turmoil. It is claimed for Ireland that she has the capacity for self-government; the events of the week tend to discredit this claim. Self-government for Ireland is not practicable unless there shall be on the part of the Irish people respect for the authority of majorities. A people so fixed in their prejudices and resentments that they can not bring themselves to accept and respect popular verdicts, is obviously lacking in the poise essential to self-government.

Under the plan as outlined by representatives of south Ireland and the British government, and as now formally accepted by a majority of the Dail Eireann, there is assured to the people of south Ireland everything—and more—than is enjoyed in an American state. The arrangement as concluded provides:

First—Establishment of an Irish free state, with a dominion status.

Second—A representative of the crown will be appointed to the post of governor-general in a manner similar to Canada.

Third—The free state oath of allegiance shall be "to the free state, the king, and the empire."

Fourth—The free state shall assume a portion of the public debt and British war expenditures.

Fifth—The royal navy shall have access to Irish ports.

Under a constitution thus outlined the people of south Ireland may, if they will, be absolutely free. They may make their own laws; they may establish and maintain their own courts; they may establish and maintain their own army. The only thing that they may not do is to conspire with and give aid and comfort to the enemies of Britain. In effect, their "Free State" will be like the dominions of Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa, a partner in the British Empire, with the large practical advantages that lie in that affiliation. No privilege that a free people may enjoy is denied them. It now remains to be seen if inherited animosity shall sustain rebellion against majority rule on the part of an infatuated group of irreconcilables. Shall a coterie of passionate hot-heads cheat the Irish people of a boon for which these many centuries they have struggled and prayed?

It is now obvious that what De Valera and his impassioned associates want is, not peace, but strife. They want the war to go on. They want to sustain conditions under which they have attained distinction and achieved prosperity. They want, in brief, to hold their jobs.

France.

It is difficult for the average American to suppress an inherited sympathy for the French Republic. It has been bred in the bone, so to speak. But France herself by her insistent militaristic "gestures," unpleasantly illustrated in the Washington Conference, is making us appraise the new France in her true proportions. There is a certain speciousness in the claim of those who apologize for France that her military projects are brought forward primarily for effect in the diplomatic game that is now being played in the international business conference at Cannes. But the demand upon credulity is too great. France has put forward her ambitious ideas with such an appearance of earnestness as to impress upon Europe, and even upon America, a growing conviction that she is trying to make herself a military power somewhat after the bad fashion of pre-war Germany. Her attempt to bring the new nations of eastern Europe into a species of "accord," her flirting with Turkey—these incidents with the whole course of her diplomacy since Versailles—seem to point to the project at an alliance in the European field so strong that it will approach a realization of the Napoleonic conception. Let it be admitted that France has some reason for the fear that some day, somehow, Germany will renew her strength and launch another attack. But can anybody seriously believe that the Prussian bogey is of such proportions that it can, say within the next ten years, be a menace to France—a menace so seriously as to justify a continued maintenance of a standing army of eight hundred thousand men and to create a navy in its strength far beyond anything France has ever had before?

From the standpoint of policy the course of France in the Washington Conference has been one of stupid indiscretion. She has persisted in the theory that this Conference is a successor to the gathering at Versailles, and in adherence to that theory she has attempted to subordinate its purposes to considerations of European diplomacy. Where the other nations have sought to keep within the field defined in the agenda, France has sought to make success of the Conference contingent upon settlement in her favor of her differences with Britain. The French commissioners—and as well the home government and the home press—appear blind to the fact that in the settlement implied in the Four-Power agreement France has in a moral sense been immeasurably strengthened as against Germany. While the Four-Power agreement is neither an offensive nor a defensive alliance there is implied in it a friendly association of France with America, Britain, and Japan. Germany will be slow to act against France while she stands before the world in established friendly relations with these strong nations. For France the Four-Power agreement, while relating only to the Far East, stands as a mark of her association with a group strong enough for any authority it may choose to exert. And this is not likely to escape the vision of Germany. That it seems to have escaped the vision of France is evidence of the fact so often noted that the eye of France seems never able to see beyond the sphere of her own direct interest. She seems unable to visualize any advantage that lacks the concrete form of a hard-and-fast commitment.

The position of France, a weak nation both numerically and financially, in an effort to masquerade as a military power is distinctly weaker than that of a France strong not so much in herself as in her affiliations. Very recently she has seen both America and Britain fighting on her own soil for her protection. The spirit that prompted their action in the late war is for France a higher security than anything she may do for herself in the way of armament. Her finances will not permit her to permanently maintain an organization strong enough for her own defense. The attempt to create and maintain such an organization, especially if supported by the cocky kind of diplomacy that she has exhibited at Washington, tends to destroy sympathy and to weaken the support which, when all is considered, is her surest bulwark. The best policy for France would be not to antagonize America, Britain, and Japan, but to cultivate sympathetic relations, in the meantime curtailing her expenditure on military account and applying her means to development of the larger resources that have been brought to her in the outcome of the war. For let it be borne in mind that despite her losses of men and of material wealth in the great war, France through her recovery of Alsace-Lorraine is as a nation stronger than she was in 1914. Nobody will wish to minimize the sacrifice she made in the five years of war. At the same time none can fail to see that in the largest view and regarded nationally she is fundamentally stronger than at any time since the Franco-Prussian war. But while this is true, she is far from being strong enough to maintain a military organization independently able to cope with forces that may be brought to bear against her even by Germany alone. Broken as Germany is, she still has resources of manpower, of physical materials and of industrial power which France alone can not match. And since France may not stand alone, she would better take the chip off her shoulder, divert her means from military to industrial account, cease nagging her potential friends, and devote her diplomacy to acquisition and retention of international sympathy.

Time to Quit.

The Washington Conference will add nothing to its record of achievements by discussion of incidental and more or less irrelevant matters. It was called for specific purposes and these purposes have been attained. All that was expected—and more—has been done. It is time to quit.

The matters that are now being pressed upon the Conference are not unimportant. They may not be dismissed as trivial. But in respect of the aims originally proposed and already achieved, they are only relatively pertinent. Their solution is beyond the competence of this body. Their discussion tends to promote antagonism. They would better be referred to a future conference or conferences, called under another mandate and holding another kind of authority.

The conference at Versailles lost itself in a maze. It attempted too much. If it had made peace with Germany, arranged for reparations, and then gone home, it would have stood as a great historic success. Trying to do overmuch, in the end it presented to the world the spectacle of a colossal and pretentious failure.

The Washington Conference should take stock of this example. It stands today in high credit. It has done all that was hoped for and something more. It is time to quit.

The Bonus.

It is now obvious that in one form or another, subject to one condition or another, the soldier bonus project is to be "put through." Somewhere between two billions and five billions of dollars are to be extracted from the taxpayers, most of whom in one form or another—in purchase of Liberty Bonds, in increased taxation or in the cost of things bought at war prices—bore their share of the burden. The bonus project is primarily an iniquitous thing because it takes money from some people and bestows it on other people. In another view it is an iniquitous thing because it is a money commutation of a patriotic obligation. It measures the service of the soldier by a standard that nullifies its moral significance. In still another way it is an iniquitous thing because it will tend to demoralize those to whom the government's bounty shall be given. Something of spiritual value, something of self-respect, would be lost to every man who accept his gratuity; and the result will be especially demoralizing to those who rendered no service. It will rob some millions of young Americans of a manly sense of self-dependence.

It will be the beginning of a campaign which in progressive series will put a mortgage upon the country for fifty years to come. Let nobody take the comforting unctious to his soul that by this first hand-out the score will be cleaned up. With appetite whetted by this first grab, under the sense of political power that will be promoted by it, demand will follow demand; and under the pressure of political expediences in which one party will vie with another, treasure upon treasure will be poured into the bottomless sink of pension legislation.

The immediate project is founded upon no consideration in equity. No sober mind recognizes a real obligation. But—there is coming a national election next November. The Republican party, in authority at Washington, is fearful of losing the next House of Representatives; and in this fear it is making a high bid for "soldier votes." Next time it will be the Democratic party which in its turn will make another and possibly a higher bid. And so it will go. The "veterans," not one of whom in five smelt gunpowder or saw a foe, not one of whom but is richer for his experience of travel and his military training, will become a big factor in politics; and as their illegitimate political value grows, in similar ratio will their individual character deteriorate—and with it the political character of our country, with the integrity and dignity of its government. Verily it is a bad business.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

From One Who Misses the Point.

CHICO, January 7, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: Your articles on mothers vs. spinners as directors in the movement for better child welfare have aroused the resentment of one of your readers because of your unfair generalization as to the latter's disqualification for such service.

As a mother may I say that much genuine help that I have had in the rearing of my children has come from an unmarried woman—a woman of parts and one who has studied child psychology and welfare, and who has been able to do such studying because she is a spinner. Motherhood doesn't always bring intelligence, and why should expectant mothers or mothers de facto not have the help from those who have not had the joys or burdens of motherhood as well as to be at the mercy of men who by nature have only a scientific or pecuniary interest in such problems, or of married women whose sole recommendation is possibly the wedding ring? If opportunity is a duty, why should those who may be fitted by training and taste be disqualified for this work because their lot is not one of the burdened mother or the parasite wife?

In Defense of Debs.

CHICO, January 8, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: In the Argonaut of December 31, 1921, in an editorial entitled "The Release of Debs," you say: "Debs' offense was open and flagrant. * * * Debs was preaching treason. Many a man has been hanged for conduct less vicious and less calculated."

Debs was arrested, indicted, tried, and convicted for words spoken by him in a speech made by him at Canton, Ohio, at some time during the late war. The speech was a Socialistic harangue, made to an audience composed largely of Socialists, and contains many expressions of which I do not approve, as I am not a Socialist, but there is no treason in it, no word that he did not have a right to say at any time and in any place where it was proper to make a public speech.

Yours very truly, HENRY NELSON.

What is believed to be the smallest modern gold coin in the world has just been minted here (says an Associated Press dispatch from Geneva to the New York Times). It represents the gold franc on which the budget of the league of nations is to be calculated. It is octagonal in form, and on one side are engraved the initials "S. D. N." (Société des Nations). Its weight is .03225805 of a gram and its value is about 2 cents in American money. A pound would require 13,200 such coins. Referring to this coin the weekly bulletin of Samuel Montagu & Co. prints an extract from the Westminster Gazette saying: "The gold franc, which is the basis of all the monetary transactions of the league of nations, is solely an expression of values and does not exist as metal currency. But a single coin to represent this monetary unit has now been struck and it contains the exact ingredients in value."

The monument to the memory of the Ulstermen who fell in France has been recently unveiled on the ridge at Thierval, where the Ulster Division won undying fame. The memorial takes the form of a replica of "Helen's Tower," at Clondeboyne, and is the most imposing yet erected on the western front. Field Marshal Sir Henry Wilson opened the tower, General Weyland performed the unveiling ceremony, and the Archbishop of Armagh conducted a dedication service. The ground around is to be left for all time just as it was after the fighting.

Canadian money to the value of $6,000,000 will be used for the rebuilding of Soissons (according to the Journal Industrielle), which says that the Soissons municipal council has approved the terms of an agreement with Canadian banking interests for a loan to that amount. Plans were adopted for realigning the streets and beautifying the city, and this work will soon begin.

MR. WELLS AND THE NEXT WAR.

H. G. Wells has recently been stressing the idea that unless an association of nations is formed with power to enforce its decisions, a war is sure to emerge from the present international status, and that it will be a war without discrimination: that is to say, a war in which the weapons will be aimed, not at the armies and fleets of the antagonist peoples, but at the people themselves. Combatants and noncombatants alike will suffer from invading aircraft, raining bombs, poison gas, and liquid fire into the cities of the contending nations, while submarines conduct indiscriminate operations against their shipping. Land armies will be more or less idle, particularly if the fighting nations are separated by the sea, as submarines can prevent their landing troops on each other's shores. This type of warfare will have the same strategic objective as the wars of the past, the final purpose of each antagonist being "to produce in the adversary a state of mind conducive to a discontinuance of the struggle, and submission or acquiescence to the will of the victor." The only new principle introduced is the idea that this purpose can best be achieved by attacking old men, women, and children, as well as combatant forces, and by threatening annihilation to the invaded nation.

With his usual ingenuity, Mr. Wells pictures a possible future war between America and Japan, in which the Japanese would establish air bases on unprotected parts of the Californian or Mexican coasts, or even at sea, the air planes being transported in submersibles to points from which they could cruise inland and throw explosives and gas into the cities and on the citizens of the Pacific Coast states. Similar operations might be conducted on the Atlantic side and from the Mexican gulf. Mr. Wells points out that in aerial warfare there are no fronts and no effectual barriers. The only answer to an aerial attack by the enemy on one's cities is an aerial attack on the cities of the enemy—an attack ruthless and general enough to bring his citizens promptly into "the state of mind conducive to submission." Warfare on this basis would be blind and deaf to all humane considerations, and would carry to a ghastly completion the system of reprisals begun in the European war.

This is a gloomy picture. Mr. Will Irwin is now traveling through America with the same dismal message, depicting future wars in which deadly and penetrating gases, like the "Lewisite" invented by Professor Lewis of Northwestern University during the war against Germany, will be dropped on cities in bombs weighing as much as 4300 pounds, and carrying a ton of T. N. T., to scatter the poisonous fumes. Lewisite is composed of acetylene with a solution of arsenic trichloride. It will penetrate any mask and burn its victims inside and out. It spreads slowly, unlike Phosgene, and is therefore less dangerous to the operator, who can spray it as safely and accurately on the city beneath him as if he were pouring water through a hose. If there is any adequate defense against this gas, it is known only to God and the uncommunicative experts in the poison gas works at Edgeworth, who have been paid $1,200,000 by the war office to investigate offensive and defensive measures relating to it. Professor Lewis may possibly have found a means to combat his own discovery. But even if so, it is impossible to conjecture what equally sinister devices are originating in the secret laboratories of other countries.

Behind the prophecies of Mr. Wells and Mr. Irwin lies a redoubtable array of facts, and the sound postulate that the Washington Conference has done nothing to make war impossible or to make the lives of noncombatants secure in time of war. The outlawing by the nations of poison gases and liquid fire has, of course, no final validity: Whatever resolutions may be passed at the Conference regarding these weapons, or submarines, or aircraft, they will have no sanction save one of "sentiment." That nations at war will break such stipulations whenever there is more to be gained than lost by so doing is the lesson of history, and of not very ancient history at that. Capable historians maintain, and with some show of reason, that we have not essentially changed in the last century or so, and that the only limitation on the conduct of nations at war continues to be the "limitations of nature."

It is undeniable also that no agreement to reduce aerial armament can mean anything, since privately-owned aircraft can be mobilized instantly at any time for purposes of war, and a nation that wishes to can always evade treaty limitations by this means.

But before concluding that the nightmare here foreshadowed is inevitable, an optimist will adduce some other considerations. In the first place there is a glint of truth in the contention that when war involves a whole population it will not be undertaken irresponsibly, or without a final and basic grievance. An army can be made the tool of selfish interests, but a people is less easily sent to needless slaughter. When all citizens are made equal partakers in the sufferings of war they will look more closely into the issue before delivering an ultimatum.

The second gleam of hope in the abyss is that warfare on these terms will diminish the mercenary motive responsible for so many past hostilities. A country fighting a capable enemy under such conditions must inevitably lose more power than it can gain, and the financial interests that have hitherto had so much to do with the precipitation of war are shrewd enough now, if they were not in 1914, to reason that one plus two minus three equals nothing. Moreover, the financial war lords are known to have a salutary regard for their comfort, and neither Phosgene or Lewisite is the soothing equivalent of talcum powder.

Which raises the larger question as to whether in the close interweaving of the interests of modern nations a war can any longer be confined to two combatants, and whether, when the nations are faced with the imminent prospect of a general war of this kind, they will not by preference agree to the compromise they now reject. If not, there is at least one grim consolation. If it has not become one of the "limitations of nature" that such warfare is unthinkable, if it has not become fundamental with us that no occasion can justify the deliberate killing of helpless children, and if after these hundred thousand years or so, we have not yet reached a stage of civilization at which we are willing to unite in order to avoid this abominable thing, we may as well put a term to our uselessness with Phosgene, Lewisite, or any other handy agent of destruction. If we hold that the doctrine of the political inequality of nations must take precedence over the fundamentals of ordinary humanity, it does not matter a particle at what time, or in what manner, or by what means we are taken off; the question of our further existence is entirely devoid of importance. We are manifestly unfit to live.

But it is to be questioned whether this desperate hypothesis has any essential basis in fact. The present attitude of many of our statesmen is very conceivably due to a lack of imagination. It is incredible that even a majority among these, when confronted with the alternatives prefigured by Mr. Wells, would hesitate to sink their differences in the interests of humanity. It has yet to be proved that any nation in which the will of more than a few has any influence on the processes of government would wage war in such a manner without the greatest effort to avoid it. And if it be urged that a democratic nation (meaning ourselves) may be forced into such a combat by an autocracy (meaning Japan, as she is the only government of that type remaining) the answer must be that Japan at her worst, and her worst is very bad, has never opposed the organization of peace on an effective basis, and was, in fact, one of the first nations at Versailles to propose it. At the same conference France, who has since shown certain militant inclinations, urged the formation of a league of nations guaranteed by the armies of the countries participating in it. Her contention that without this provision paper agreements are not dependable, has never been refuted. England did not oppose such a settlement. The weaker nations had no interest in hindering it. The obstacle was certainly not China, or Germany, or Russia. If there should ever be a war in the future of the sort described above, the responsibility must apparently therefore rest at our door. And it is impossible to conceive our allowing it to be said that we alone paved the way for this horror because of some precious technicality concerning Article X, the Monroe Doctrine, and Senator Borah.

The tactical flaw in Mr. Wells' prediction about Japan and America is that in the awful event of such a war as he prefigures the advantage would so obviously lie with America that before inviting her own destruction by declaring war, Japan would first have to go mad. America's great advantage would consist in the fact that her population is dispersed over a very wide area, whereas that of Japan is thickly centered in a relatively confined space. She could be decimated by an air attack at a vastly more rapid rate than we, and her planes would have to operate at a greater distance from their bases. The difference in the swiftness of destruction would be something like the difference between pouring poison into an ant hill and scattering it along the ant tracks. As regards aerial attack, we are in similar position with reference to all the countries of Europe—which may be one of the reasons why we continue to smile at the prophets and lightly profane the memory of Monroe.

SOME NOTES AT RANDOM.

One of the marks of strong national feeling in a subject race is the tenacity with which they cling to their original tongue and to their ancestral names. That the negroes in this country have no nostalgia for the jungles of their fathers is well confirmed by their indifference about African dialects, and if they have any sentiment at all regarding the names Crow and Black and Green, with which they are commonly designated, it is only from a mild preference for such appellations as Hyacinth Windemere and Vincent de Vere. The American Indians exhibit a greater racial pride in their partial retention of native dialects and names. One of the pathetic traits of the French inhabitants of Alsace-Lorraine under German rule was their attachment, so touchingly described by Maurice Barrès, to French words and French names. In the same connection it would be interesting to know what is happening to the Dutch language in South Africa and what will be the future of Chinese in Shantung.

In Ireland the revival of Gaelic speech and Gaelic names is one of the most noticeable signs of vitality in the nationalist movement. It has other uses, of course. No one who has cudgelled his way through life under the homely designation of "Micky Collins" could resist a certain sense of elevation not altogether connected with patriotism in being chartered to write himself "Michael O'Coileain" on an historic document. There is something academic and not quite convincing in "Art O'Griobtha," the device of Arthur Griffiths. But who could hesitate between "Duggan" and "O'Duguin," or between "Gavan Duffy" and "Seorsa Ghabain Uí Dubthaig"?

In England the double-barreled name is rarer, but not uncommon. The real name, for instance, of one of the British signatories of the treaty, Lord Birkenhead, is the same as Mary Pickford's, i. e., Smith. F. E. Smith, to be exact. In the old days he used to be "Effy" to his friends, among whom was his loyal comrade in arms and venomous opponent in Parliament, Winston Churchill. When the latter wished to be especially ironic in a House debate he referred to the present Lord Birkenhead as the "gallant and galloping Mr. Smith." The irony is not particularly apparent to an American ear, but it has to do with the fact that members of Parliament with an army title are commonly addressed in debate as the "honorable and gallant member," and that while Mr. Smith had served in the South African war, he had no prefix of military rank. Also (though some will find this difficult to believe) in times prior to the European war, and before conscription had democratized the British army, it was felt to be inconsistent that any one should aspire to commissioned rank in the army with a name like Smith, or Baker, or Miller, or any such titular indication that the founder of his house was a tradesman. Hence "Smith-Dorrien," which delicately and successfully evades the difficulty. But in political life it is not unlikely that the name "Smith" would prove of advantage to its owner, if he were an unusually able man, since the camouflage essential to the dignity of government and the beauty of public documents could and would be quickly conferred by elevating him to a peership.

As for Lord Birkenhead, any one who has heard him arguing a case as Advocate F. E. Smith in Justice Darling's court will feel inclined to regret that he has abandoned the law even for the upper reaches of politics. He was a really magnificent lawyer—at his best in the suave subtleties of cross-examination, or in by-plays with a humorous judge, and a master for summarizing. These qualities doubtless proved valuable in the Irish conference, and help account for his success as a politician, but somehow one would rather have seen him a judge. Before he became a political peer and lost his good looks, together with his valiant and romantic name, he cut a figure in a wig and gown, that was the despair of the most debonaire actors in London. Now he is Birkenhead and looks like a mayor—than which I can imagine no sadder fate.

A writer in the New York Times maintains that when the Irish government is established it will prove to be the first government in history with a sense of humor. This may be true, since the question is one of degree. But thus far the Irish debates have been characterized by a highly entertaining absence of that quality. What the Times writer meant was probably that the Irish parliament will be comparatively free from the heavy circumlocutions that so distinguish the governments of other countries. It certainly bids fair to be the most outspoken assembly of all time. When McCabe was defending the Irish treaty the other day, Miss Mary McSwiney interrupted him to say that the women of Ireland were against the pact. McCabe retorted, "I know what the women of Ireland want as well as you." I don't know precisely what this is, but it is certainly not humor. One meets the same thing in Socialist debates, and in all discussions where the speakers are naïvely earnest about their subject matter. This much, however, is certain, that the Irish parliament will prove the fightingest legislative body in the world. When Miss McSwiney demanded of the Irish leaders in her attack on Collins' agreement with Lloyd George, "Would you follow Micky Collins to hell?" and their reply came back in a roar that shook the rafters, "We will!" one glimpsed a spirit of belligerent loyalty which is even more characteristic of the Irish than what we call their "humor." To expect humor in Ireland at the present time is, in fact, rather foolish. It would be a bad omen for the Irish government if it did not take itself with intense earnestness during this early period of its activity. But as time wears on, the Irish people, who lack the faculty of self-deception, will doubtless perceive that self-government is as wild and laughable an illusion as any in this world of paradoxes.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Miss Ruth Lewinson was recently appointed a trustee of Hunter College. Miss Lewinson is one of the leading women lawyers of New York.

Lord Mount Stephen, who was in turn director, vice-president, and president of the Bank of Montreal and president of the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway, died recently at the age of ninety-two. George Stephen, first Baron Mount Stephen, was the son of William Stephen, a carpenter, of Dufftown, Banffshire, and was born on June 5, 1829. As a boy he herded the minister's cattle; then he went to Aberdeen to learn the drapery trade, and later went to London. In 1850 he went to Canada. Here he became a merchant in Montreal, and laid the foundations of a great industrial career. He became a banker and a railway magnate. With three others—one his cousin, Lord Strathcona—he founded the Canadian Pacific Railway, and remained its head until 1888. Lord Mount Stephen's last years were spent in England.

The Knopf Prize for the best book written by a Columbia undergraduate during the year was given to David Sentner, war veteran, who is rapidly losing the sight of his one eye. "Cobblestones," Mr. Sentner's first published book of verse, is also the first book to win the Alfred A. Knopf Prize offered by Mr. Knopf, who is a Columbia graduate of 1912. Mr. Sentner, a member of the Columbia Class of 1923, served two years in the Twenty-Seventh Division, A. E. F., and was severely wounded while in action on the Hindenburg line and again in Flanders. He came to Columbia under the United States Veteran Bureau to study writing. At Columbia he has contributed to the university literary magazines, and has won a chief place on the campus among the group of undergraduate poets. He was born in New York City in August, 1895, and was educated in the New York public schools, leaving high school to work as a reporter on a metropolitan daily. Mr. Sentner is one of the founders of the Columbia Come Back Club, an organization of 300 wounded war veterans studying at the university, and is a member of "Boar's Head," the Columbia poetry society.

Melville E. Stone's publishers furnish the following story of how the former head of the Associated Press was precipitated into journalism. Before he became a newspaper man Mr. Stone was a lock salesman, and such a successful one that his ambition was limited only by the number of farm houses in the United States. His method of approach was unique. If the farmer remained unconvinced after his moving argument he offered to put on the lock just to show how it worked. After the lock was screwed into the place of the old one his crowning argument was that he couldn't put the old one back on, for the hole that he had bored for the new one would show and disfigure the door. One old farmer was particularly obdurate and demanded that he put the old one back on. All of Mr. Stone's persuasions were in vain. Finally, in desperation, he refused to take off the new lock, picked up his tools, and walked away. The irate farmer unchained his bulldog and they both gave chase. Mr. Stone climbed the nearest fence and from his position of safety promised to remove the lock. That was the last lock that the young salesman ever sold. He decided to find a more congenial profession and, thanks to the farmer's dog, became a newspaper man.

Sir William Robertson, who was chief of the imperial general staff for half the period of the war, gives as the principal reason for writing his book, "From Private to Field Marshal," the fact that "it describes the climbing of a soldier from the bottom to the top of the military ladder; and even in this feat there is nothing remarkable beyond the fact that it happens to be the first of its kind in the annals of the British army." Here is the chronology of this remarkable promotion: Enlisted, 1877; lance corporal, 1878; corporal, 1879; lance sergeant, 1881; sergeant, 1882; troop sergeant major, 1885; second lieutenant, 1888; lieutenant, 1891; captain, 1895; major, 1900; lieutenant-colonel, 1900; colonel, 1903; major-general, 1910; lieutenant-general, 1915; general, 1916; field marshal, 1920. But, having arrived at his present distinguished position, he can look back over his past and say: "I derived greater satisfaction from being promoted lance corporal in 1878—the first rung of the ladder—than I did from being created a baronet forty years later; and as lieutenant, I felt prouder to be in command at the railhead of a frontier expeditionary force in India of less than 10,000 men than, as general, to be chief of imperial general staff in the greatest conflict the world has ever known, when the number of our troops ran into several millions."

Arthur Griffith, the Irish leader, is a Dublin man and, unlike most Irish workers and thinkers, a completely urban man, curiously unfamiliar with the country and with country people. He is by profession a political journalist—by trade a compositor; and recent events may prove him a statesman. Griffith is the only one of the present-day Irish leaders whose activities go back to Parnell and his era. As a very young man Griffith was in the Parnell fight, but after that fight had been lost Griffith went to South Africa. He worked in the mining fields around Johannesburg and he was one of the few Outlanders who was for Paul Kruger and the Boers. Griffith return to Ireland in time to help found the United Irishman in 1898—the centenary of the insurrection of 1798. The United Irishman was a weekly newspaper that stood for the separatist idea in Irish politics. Yeats, "A. E.," John Eglinton contributed to it, though the bulk of the writing was done by Griffith. But he had enunciated no distinctive policy till the appearance of "The Resurrection of Hungary" as a serial in the United Irishman. This purported to be a parallel to the case of Ireland. The programme which Griffith submitted to his political party for the restoration of the Irish constitution was at first called "The Hungarian Policy." Later this term was superseded by Sinn Féin, a watchword which means "Ourselves." Griffith is a protectionist and a believer in tariffs. There is nothing new in his conception of the state. He is, in fact, considered a reactionary by the labor party, which is his greatest political antagonist.

OLD FAVORITES.

An Ode to Master Anthony Stafford.

Come, spur away,
I have no patience for a longer stay,
But must go down
And leave the chargeable noise of this great town:
I will the country see,
Where old simplicity,
Though hid in gray,
Doth look more gay
Than foppery in plush and scarlet clad.
Farewell, you city wits, that are Almost at civil war—
'Tis time that I grow wise, when all the world grows mad.

More of my days
I will not spend to gain an idiot's praise;
Or to make sport
For some slight Puisse of the Inns of Court.
Then, worthy Stafford, say,
How shall we spend the day?
With what delights
Shorten the nights?
When from this tumult we are got secure,
Where mirth with all her freedom goes,
Yet shall no finger lose;
Where every word is thought, and every thought is pure?

There from the tree
We'll cherries pluck, and pick the strawberry;
And every day
Go see the wholesome country girls make hay,
Whose brown bath lovelier grace
Than any painted face
That I do know
Hyde Park can show:
Where I had rather gain a kiss than meet
(Though some of them in greater state Might court my love with plate)
The beauties of the Cheap, and wives of Lombard Street.

But think upon
Some other pleasures: these to me are none.
Why do I prate
Of women, that are things against my fate!
I never mean to wed
That torture to my bed:
My Muse is she
My love shall be.
Let clowns get wealth and heirs: when I am gone
And that great bugbear, grisly Death,
Shall take this idle breath,
If I a poem leave, that poem is my son.

Of this no more!
We'll rather taste the bright Pomona's store.
No fruit shall 'scape
Our palates, from the damson to the grape.
Then, full, we'll seek a shade,
And hear what music's made;
How Philomel
Her tale doth tell,
And how the other birds do fill the quire;
The thrush and blackbird lend their throats,
Warbling melodious notes;
We will all sports enjoy which others but desire.

Ours is the sky,
Where at what fowl we please our hawk shall fly:
Nor will we spare
To hunt the crafty fox or timorous hare;
But let our hounds run loose
In any ground they'll choose;
The buck shall fall,
The stag, and all.
Our pleasures must from their own warrants be,
For to my Muse, if not to me,
I'm sure all game is free:
Heaven, earth, are all but parts of her great royalty.

And when we mean
To taste of Bacchus' blessings now and then,
And drink by stealth
A cup or two to noble Barkley's health,
I'll take my pipe and try
The Phrygian melody;
Which he that hears,
Lets through his ears
A madness to distemper all the brain:
Then I another pipe will take
And Doric music make,
To civilize with graver notes our wits again.

The Salutation of the Dawn.

Listen to the exhortation of the Dawn:
Look to this day! * * *
In its brief course lie all the verities and realities of your existence:
The bliss of growth,
The glory of action,
The splendor of beauty:
For yesterday is but a dream,
And tomorrow is only a vision;
But today well lived makes
Every yesterday a dream of happiness,
And every tomorrow a vision of hope.
Look well, therefore, to this day!
Such is the salutation of the Dawn. —From the Sanskrit.

THE BOYHOOD OF JEAN HENRI FABRE.

Bernard Miall Translates a Great Frenchman's Memoirs.

It was Maeterlinck who first described Jean Fabre as "The Insects' Homer"—exquisite praise from a writer who was as well qualified to judge of poetry as of entomology. But the title was amply deserved. No reader of Fabre's works will deny the enchantment of information, color, atmosphere, and incident with which he enlarges the most trivial facts in the lives of the least of nature's creatures. He is perhaps the only scientific writer in history who has won an equal tribute of admiration from scientists, men of letters, and laymen alike. It was to this universality of appeal that Darwin referred in calling him "the savant who thinks like a philosopher and writes like a poet."

With these great gifts Fabre combined a certain child-like simplicity, in the sense that he never lost the child's faculty of minute observation, and retained throughout his learned researches into the causes of natural phenomena all his youthful freshness of wonder at the miracle of life. This is a truly rare thing in a scientist. His mode of living remained, even at the zenith of his fame, as simple as that of his shepherd grandfather, and the "competence" he acquired before his death did not alter it a particle.

Modern social critics have often written of the handicaps imposed by poverty on the intellectual proletariat, but for Fabre, poverty seems to have been from the first the well spring of his greatness. Denied, as a child, the diversions available to wealthy children, he found their rich equivalent in such wonderful playthings as can be picked up in the fields or waysides, and having few artificial sources of knowledge, he drew an infinitely greater store at first hand from nature, finding, in the full sense of the proverb, books in the running brooks and sermons in stones. Like St. Francis of Assisi, or our own John Burroughs, by virtue of poverty he learned the language of the bird and bee and the universal harmonies. In the days of Burns and Wordsworth, this explanation would have been a truism, but it seems to need re-emphasizing at a period when Shavian reformers so grimly insist that poverty is a crime, and the creed of St. Francis a doctrine for slaves. Personally, were we a plutocrat, we would most gladly exchange the hard oak fauteuil of a directors' meeting, or the marbled halls of railway presidents, for the privilege of roaming the open country in the company of this incomparable observer, and of sharing with him the "treasure of the humble" and the freedom of those whose only wealth is the universe.

Fabre died in 1915, full of years and honor—a long span from the birthday in 1823 recorded in the parish registry of Saint Léons. The place of his birth is situated on the Rouergue tableland in Provence, some three thousand feet above the sea, in a wild region of mossy fens and rocky pastures, studded with oak trees and thickets of broom and blackthorn. It is a place from which only the shepherd and the thrifty owner of cattle can derive a livelihood. Fabre's parents were very poor, and in order to relieve the household expenses he was sent to live with his grandparents in the adjoining village of Malaval.

Here we can pick up one of the autobiographical passages his editor has culled from the "Souvenirs Entomologiques." His grandfather's farm is sown with rye, oats, and potatoes, in spots where the gorse has been burned away to allow plowing, but the soil and climate are none too favorable to husbandry:

Grandfather, therefore, was, before all, a herdsman versed in the lore of cows and sheep, but completely ignorant of aught else. How dumfounded he would have been to learn that, in the remote future, one of his family would become enamoured of those insignificant animals to which he had never vouchsafed a glance in his life! Had he guessed that that lunatic was myself, the scapegrace seated at the table by his side, what a smack of the head I should have caught, what a wrathful look!

I was five or six years old. That the poor household might have one mouth less to feed, I had been placed in grandfather's care. Here, in solitude, my first gleams of intelligence were awakened amidst the geese, the calves, and the sheep. Everything before that is impenetrable darkness. My real birth was at the moment when the dawn of personality rises, dispersing the mists of unconsciousness and leaving a lasting memory. I can see myself plainly, clad in a soiled frieze frock flapping against my bare heels; I remember the handkerchief hanging from my waist by a bit of string, a handkerchief often lost and replaced by the back of my sleeve.

There I stand one day, a pensive urchin, with my hands behind my back and my face turned to the sun. The dazzling splendor fascinates me. I am the Moth attracted by the light of the lamp. With what am I enjoying the glorious radiance: with my mouth or my eyes? That is the question put by my budding scientific curiosity. Reader, do not smile! the future observer is already practicing and experimenting. I open my mouth wide and close my eyes: the glory disappears. I open my eyes and shut my mouth: the glory reappears. I repeat the performance, with the same result. The question's solved: I have learnt by deduction that I see the sun with my eyes. What a discovery! That evening I told the whole house all about it. Grandmother smiled fondly at my simplicity: the others laughed at it. 'Tis the way of the world.

He is sent at an early age to a school in Saint Léons. But what a cradle for a future savant and philosopher! Among the younger pupils he is left to decipher an alphabet book without help—the master having time only for the instruction of more advanced scholars:

The big ones use to write. They had the benefit of the small amount of light in the room, by the narrow window where the Wandering Jew and ruthless Golo faced each other, and of the large and only table with its circle of seats. The school supplied nothing, not even a drop of ink; every one had to come with a full set of utensils. The ink-horn of those days, a relic of the ancient pencease of which Rabelais speaks, was a long cardboard box divided into two stages. The upper compartment held the pens, made of goose-quill trimmed with a penknife; the lower contained, in a tiny well, ink made of soot mixed with vinegar.

The master's great business was to mend the pens—a delicate task, not without danger for inexperienced fingers—and then to trace at the head of the white page a line of strokes, single letters, or words according to the scholar's capabilities. When that is over, keep an eye on the work of art which is coming to adorn the copy! With what undulating movements of the wrist does the hand, resting on the little finger, prepare and plan its flight! All at once the hand starts off, flies, whirls; and lo and behold, under the line of writing is unfurled a garland of circles, spirals, and flourishes, framing a bird with outspread wings; the whole, if you please, in red ink, the only kind worthy of such a pen. Large and small, we stood awestruck in the presence of such marvels. The family, in the evening, after supper, would pass from hand to hand the masterpiece brought back from school:—

"What a man!" was the comment. "What a man, to draw you a Holy Ghost with one stroke of the pen!"

What was read at my school? At most, in French, a few selections from sacred history. Latin recurred oftener, to teach us to sing vespers properly. The more advanced pupils tried to decipher manuscript, a deed of sale, the hieroglyphics of some scrivener.

When all is said, our master was an excellent man who could have kept school very well but for his lack of one thing: and that was time. He devoted to us all the little leisure which his numerous functions left him. And first of all, he managed the property of an absentee landowner, who only occasionally set foot in the village. He had under his care an old castle with four towers, which had become so many pigeon-houses; he directed the getting-in of the hay, the walnuts, the apples, and the oats. We used to help him during the summer, when the school, which was well attended in winter, was almost deserted. The few who remained, because they were not yet big enough to work in the fields, were small children, including him who was one day to set down these memorable facts.

Our master was a barber. With his light hand, which was so clever at beautifying our copies with curlicue birds, he shaved the notabilities of the place: the mayor, the parish priest, the notary. Our master was a bell-ringer. A wedding or a christening interrupted the lessons; he had to ring a peal. A gathering storm gave us a holiday: the great bell must be tolled to ward off the lightning and the hail. Our master was a choir-singer. With his mighty voice he filled the church where he led the "Magnificat" at vespers. Our master wound up the village clock. This was his proudest function. Giving a glance at the sun, to ascertain the time more or less nearly, he would climb to the top of the steeple, open a huge cage of rafters, and find himself in a maze of wheels and springs whereof the secret was known to him alone.

The young scholar at last masters the alphabet and the rudiments of reading by means of an animal picture book his father brings him from the market fair. Thus early begin the circumstances that are to conduct him, in the fullness of time, from printed to living knowledge. His first researches of importance in natural history are conducted at the brink of a pond, where he waters his grandfather's ducks. Here, one day, he is breaking stones to build a toy mill dam, when—but let him tell the story in his own unrivaled way:

On one of the broken stones, in a cavity large enough for me to put my fist in, something gleams like glass. The hollow is lined with facets gathered in sixes which flash and glitter in the sun. I have seen something like this in church, on the great saint's day, when the light of the candles in the big chandelier kindles the stars in its hanging crystal.

We children, lying in summer, on the straw of the threshing-floor, have told one another stories of the treasures which a dragon guards underground. Those treasures now return to my mind: the names of precious stones ring out uncertainly but gloriously in my memory. I think of the king's crown, of the princesses' necklaces. In breaking stones, can I have found, but on a much richer scale, the thing that shines quite small in my mother's ring? I want more such.

The dragon of the subterranean treasures treats me generously. He gives me his diamonds in such quantities that soon I possess a heap of broken stones sparkling with magnificent clusters. He does more: he gives me his gold. The water from the rock falls on a bed of fine sand which it swirls into bubbles. If I bend towards the light, I see something like gold-filings whirl where the fall touches the bottom.

I take a pinch of sand and place it in my palm. The brilliant particles are numerous, but so small that I have to pick them up with a straw moistened in my mouth. Let us drop this: they are too tiny and too bothersome to collect.

I break more stones. Oh, what a queer thing has just come loose, all in one piece! It is turned spiral-wise, like certain flat Snails that come out of the cracks of old walls in rainy weather. With its gnarled sides, it looks like a little ram's-horn. Shell or horn, it is very curious. How do things like that find their way into the stone?

Treasures and curiosities make my pockets bulge with pebbles. It is late, and the little ducklings have had all they want to eat. Come along, youngsters, let's go home. My blistered heel is forgotten in my excitement.

The walk back is a delight. A voice sings in my ear, an untranslatable voice, softer than any language and bewildering as a dream. It speaks to me for the first time of the mysteries of the pond; it glorifies the heavenly insect which I hear moving in the empty snail-shell, its temporary cage; it whispers the secrets of the rock, the gold-filings, the faceted jewels, the ram's-horn turned to stone.

Poor simpleton, smother your joy! I arrive. My parents catch sight of my bulging pockets, with their disgraceful load of stones. The cloth has given way under the rough and heavy burden.

"You rascal!" says father, at sight of the damage. "I send you to mind the ducks and you amuse yourself picking up stones, as though there weren't enough of them round the house! Make haste and throw them away!"

Broken-hearted, I obey. Diamonds, gold-dust, petrified ram's horn, heavenly Beetle all flung on a rubbish-heap outside the door.

Other excursions bring more discoveries:

What is this at my feet? A lovely bird has flown from its hiding place under the eaves of a big stone. Bless us, here's a nest made of hair and fine straw! It's the first I have ever found, the first of the joys which the birds are to bring me. And in this nest are six eggs, laid prettily side by side; and these eggs are a magnificent blue, as though steeped in a dye of celestial azure. Overpowered with happiness, I lie down on the grass and stare.

Meanwhile the mother, with a little clasp of her gullet—"Tack! Tack!"—flies anxiously from stone to stone, not far from the intruder. My age knows no pity, is still too barbarous to understand maternal anguish. A plan is running in my head, a plan worthy of a little beast of prey. I will come back in a fortnight and collect the nestlings before they can fly away. In the meantime, I will just take one of those pretty blue eggs, only one, as a trophy. Lest it should be crushed, I place the fragile thing on a little moss in the scoop of my hand. Let him cast a stone at me that has not, in his childhood, known the rapture of finding his first nest.

My delicate burden, which would be ruined by a false step, makes me give up the remainder of the climb. Some other day I shall see the trees on the hill-top over which the sun rises. I go down the slope again. At the bottom I meet the parish priest's curate reading his breviary as he takes his walk. He sees me coming solemnly along, like a relic-bearer; he catches sight of my hand hiding something behind my back:

"What have you there, my boy?" he asks.

All abashed, I open my hand and show my blue egg on its bed of moss.

"Ah!" says his reverence. "A Saxicola's egg! Where did you get it?"

"Up there, father, under a stone."

Question follows question; and my peccadillo stands confessed. "By chance I found a nest which I was not looking for. There were six eggs in it. I took one of them—here it is—and I am waiting for the rest to hatch. I shall go back for the others when the young birds have their quill-feathers."

"You mustn't do that, my little friend," replies the priest. "You mustn't rob the mother of her brood; you must respect the innocent little ones; you must let God's birds grow up and fly from the nest. They are the joy of the fields, and they clear the earth of its vermin. Be a good boy, now, and don't touch the nest."

I promise; and the curate continues his walk. I come home with two good seeds cast on the fallows of my childish brain. An authoritative word has taught me that plundering birds' nests is a bad action. I did not quite understand how the bird comes to our aid by destroying vermin, the scourge of the crops; but I felt, at the bottom of my heart, that it is wrong to afflict the mothers.

"Saxicola," the priest had said, on seeing my find.

"Hullo!" said I to myself. "Animals have names, just like ourselves. Who named them? What are all my different acquaintances in the woods and meadows called? What does Saxicola mean?"

At the age of ten he moves with his family to the larger town of Rodez, where he attends "college," learns some Latin and mathematics, and applies himself to study with the industry of a good son whose education has been purchased with parental sacrifices. But here also he learns of new flowers, birds, and insects, and makes the momentous discovery that turkeys can be hypnotized. These investigations are interrupted by a family misfortune that drops him, while still a little lad, "on the road like Perrault's Tom Thumb," to wander the world alone in search of a livelihood. After many hardships he comes to the town of Avignon, where the normal college is holding a bursary examination. Fabre sits the examination and wins the scholarship—thus gaining a few years of security for further study. But the curriculum of the normal school is too confined to include the subjects in which he is most interested. It is only when he leaves the school and goes as a master to Carpentras that he begins to learn in earnest, as many great men have done: by teaching. Greatly daring, he learns how to make oxygen by announcing a chemical demonstration and making it an experiment. He spends a part of his 700 francs a year on a crude surveyor's outfit, and takes his scholars afield on triangulating experiments, but here he encounters something of more moment to him than bench marks and angles:

From the very first day, my attention was attracted by something suspicious. If I sent one of the boys to plant a stake, I would see him stop frequently on his way, bend down, stand up again, look about and stoop once more, neglecting his straight line and his signals. Another, who was told to pick up the arrows, would forget the iron pin and take up a pebble instead; and a third, deaf to the measurements of angles, would crumble a clod of earth between his fingers. Most of them were caught licking a bit of straw. The polygon came to a full stop, the diagonals suffered. What could the mystery be?

I inquired; and everything was explained. A born searcher and observer, the scholar had long known what the master had not yet heard of, namely, that there was a big black Bee who made clay nests on the pebbles of the harmas. These nests contained honey; and my surveyors used to open them and empty the cells with a straw. The honey, although rather strong-flavored, was most acceptable. I acquired a taste for it myself and joined the nest-hunters, putting off the polygon till later. It was thus that I first saw Réaumur's Mason Bee.

The magnificent Bee herself, with her dark-violet wings and black-velvet raiment, her rustic edifices on the sun-blistered pebbles amid the thyme, her honey, providing a diversion from the severities of the compass and the square, all made a great impression on my mind; and I wanted to know more than I had learnt from the schoolboys, which was just how to rob the cells of their honey with a straw. As it happened, my bookseller had a gorgeous work on insects for sale. It was called "Histoire naturelle de animaux articulés," by de Castelnau, E. Blanchard, and Lucas, and boasted a multitude of most attractive illustrations; but the price of it, the price of it! No matter: was not my splendid income supposed to cover everything, food for the mind as well as food for the body? Anything extra that I gave to the one I could save upon the other; a method of balancing painfully familiar to those who look to science for their livelihood. The purchase was effected. That day my professional emoluments were severely strained: I devoted a month's salary to the acquisition of the book. I had to resort to miracles of economy for some time to come before making up the enormous deficit.

The book was devoured; there is no other word for it. In it I learnt the name of my black Bee; I read for the first time various details of the habits of insects; I found, surrounded in my eyes with a sort of halo, the revered names of Réaumur, Huber, and Léon Dufour; and, while I turned over the pages for the hundredth time, a voice within me seemed to whisper:

"You also shall be of their company!"

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending January 7, 1922 (five days), were $133,700,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $173,900,000; a decrease of $42,200,000.

The securities market strikingly evidences the radical change for the better which has taken place in finance in the last two years. During the latter months of both 1919 and 1920 liquidation in all classes of securities was heavy and prices fell. This was the result of tension in the money market, indusness a month or so ago should have been accentuated in recent weeks is not at all surprising, and the slight reaction which has developed in certain lines of trade of late would call for no special comment at this time if it were not desirable to present the existing situation before the community in its proper light. If the disappointment which has been expressed in some quarters over the unsatisfactory tendencies of industry is a true index of the public mind, it would appear that very many persons in the country were misled by the moderate increase in activity, which occurred in September, into a belief that the long-deferred revival in general industry had set in already, and not alone that, but also that they had become convinced that the improvement would be rapid and progressive from that time forth (says John Grant Dater in Harper's Magazine).

Such, of course, were never the views entertained by experienced observers who recognized that the gain in business was the result, in large part, of a seasonal demand; a highly favorable feature in itself, but not a very important matter when it comes to a sustained and progressive recovery in business after an acute and long-continued depression. A permanent improvement under prevailing conditions can not be brought about by a little spurt of activity incident to the change of the seasons or by the timid and cautious buying of the jobbers and retailers of this country to replenish their depleted stocks. It awaits, rather, the completion of some highly important adjustments here and abroad and, in particular, it awaits upon the reestablishment of the normal buying power of the agricultural community of this country—one-half our total population—and upon that of the foreign nations.

Although disappointing to very many persons, who had anticipated too much from the slight betterment in business experienced in the early autumn, the recent setback is not a matter of very grave consequence, and it was to have been expected that the markets would ease off as soon as the seasonal demand for goods and wares had been fully supplied. It would be otherwise, of course, if the recession implied any change for the worse in basic and fundamental conditions in this country, but that, assuredly, is not the case; and another feature which goes far in robbing the setback of any serious significance is the fact that general industry has entered upon the dull season of the year. December is a month which, even under favorable circumstances, has always been characterized by a slowing down of activity, and usually by an uncertain or reactionary movement in prices.

This, of course, is due to the fact that custom, born of ages, has ordained that January 1st should be the time for the casting up of accounts and the balancing of the books for the year. The season, to be sure, is neither seedtime nor harvest; it determines nothing of the future and any other date—St. Patrick's Day or the Fourth of July, for example—would serve as well for the purpose of stock taking. But nothing worth while is to be gained by quarreling with custom, and so, in advance of the traditional day of settlement, merchants and manufacturers are usually disinclined to increase their inventories, and many of them are disposed to reduce their commitments. The net result is inactivity or dullness, and not infrequently this is accompanied by irregularity and reaction. A brief consideration of these features—namely, the natural aftermath of a seasonal improvement and the normal contraction incident thereto and incident on many occasions, also, to the inactivities and considerations of the closing year—ought to dispel any gloomy forebodings arising out of the recent slight setback in business.

That there has been a marked improvement in the general situation during the year now drawing to its close admits of no serious doubt, but the betterment has been more pronounced in the conditions surrounding money and credit than elsewhere, and the amount of business now passing in the country and overseas is not as large in volume as that in progress twelve months ago. This is clearly enough indicated by the marked decline in bank clearings which day after day and week after week and month after month have been showing contractions ranging all the way from 15 to 30 per cent., and also by the appalling decline in exports and imports. During the ten months ended with October last, for instance, the merchandise imported into the United States was of the aggregate value of $2,055,762,580 compared with $4,691,214,992 for the corresponding months in 1920, a decrease of $2,635,452,412. Exports for the same period this year were of the total value of $3,898,307,733 against $6,831,201,222 in 1920, a decline of $2,932,893,489.

Some part of the enormous shrinkage in foreign as well as in domestic commerce is due, no doubt, to the general and very extensive decline in the prices of raw materials and manufactured goods, but, even allowing for this feature, and it is apparent that there has been a stupendous contraction in the volume of trade during the year. Liquidation has continued without cessation throughout the entire interval, as is revealed by the banking records and statistics. Thus, coincident with a decline to December 1st in the loans and discounts of the national banks of the country, estimated at upward of about $2,000,000,000, the earning assets of the Federal Reserve Banks have decreased from $3,306,000,000 to $1,482,000,000, or $1,824,000,000, and the ratio of reserves has increased from 44.4 per cent. a year ago to 72.3 per cent. at the present writing.

Although liquidation has gone very far, particularly in the industrial and manufacturing East, it is doubtful if it has been completed even yet in that section, and it is destined to proceed still further in the agricultural sections of the West and South.

The credit situation is vastly better than it was a year ago, owing chiefly to liquidation in commercial and industrial centres. Liquidation has proceeded slowly in the agricultural territory, but the borrowing between reserve banks has ceased, each reserve institution being now squarely on its own feet. The reserve percentages are high, and this has occasioned some criticism, but they are due more to a growth of reserves than to a reduction of liabilities. The interest rate is down now at all the reserve banks to not more than 5 per cent. (says the National City Bank in New York in their monthly letter on money investments).

As to the demand for money, a distinction must be made between money wanted for new purposes and money wanted to pay old debts.

There is a great demand for the latter purpose, but very little demand for the former. There is no reason for adding to the productive capacity of the industries while the existing capacity is largely idle. The readjustments in industry will have to be completed before the demand for new capital for development purposes will revive.

Meanwhile industrial companies continue to borrow by means of bonds for the purpose of clearing up bank indebtedness and providing for prospective needs. This policy is contributing to increasing ease in the banking situation. An issue of $30,000,000 of fifteen-year 6 per cent. debentures at 98½ by the American Sugar Refining Company is one of the important recent issues of this class.

The investment securities market made a great record in the last two weeks of December, with the following successful flotations: $55,000,000 New York City fifty-year 4½ sioned by the discussion of the bonus bill in Washington. Prices declined from one to two points, but the last few days have seen a strengthening in government securities. This reaction is the first real decline which has taken place since last September. The 3½s sold at 93, the Second 4½s sold under 95, the Third 4½s at 96.30, and the Fourth 4½s at 95.5%. The market has strengthened, however, to the average extent of about 1 per cent., and the Victory notes remained strong, closing at 100.02.

It seems evident that the more stable foreign governments have now established their credit on a 6½ per cent. to 7 per cent. basis, as compared with 8 per cent. earlier in the year. Our stronger industrials are obtaining a 6 per cent. return, as compared with 8 per cent. Our first-grade municipals have advanced from a 5 per cent. return to approxiof deflation is regarded as an interruption of good times, probably brought about by some sinister influence. It will be found, however, that the severity of deflation corresponds to the extent of inflation, being a natural reaction after an over-stimulated movement in the other direction.

An "inflation" of credit means an expansion which has exceeded normal proportions. The use of credit increases naturally with the growth of wealth and business, but at times it is over-stimulated and increases more rapidly than the growth of wealth or the physical volume of production and trade. This is necessarily a temporary movement, because it is impossible that outstanding credit shall for very long increase faster than the growth of actual wealth. Credit is a reflection of wealth, dependent upon wealth, and if it increases faster than the latter it will soon become fictitious and discredited.

An excessive use of credit during a period of general confidence means a corresponding exercise of purchasing power, and prices move upward under the influence. The markets get out of balance, overweighted on the buying side. This situation is plainly artificial and impermanent. Credit can not go on increasing indefinitely at that rate, unless all relations to actual values are abandoned, and this fact puts a limit on the rise of prices. As markets, moreover, in the course of a rising movement get into a state where unless they can keep on rising they are bound to decline.

Probably no other business or profession has experienced so rapid expansion during the past few years as the legitimate bond house. It has been repeatedly pointed out that prior to the war there were in this country only 300,000 people who either held stocks or bonds. At the end of the war some 20,000,000 people were classed as holders of securities. While a large portion of these people were patriotic subscribers to Liberty Loan issues and have since sold their bonds, a very large number have continued as investors by the purchase of other classes of securities. It is natural, therefore, that there should be a much greater public interest in bonds than ever before. During 1921 about $4,107,957,626 bonds, exclusive of United States Treasury Certificates, were sold in the United States (according to the January Review, published by Strassburger & Co.).

The question as to the safety of investments, especially in bonds and notes, is constantly arising. A complete and accurate record of losses is, of course, impossible. However, enough is known to show that losses incurred through the purchase of sound bonds through reputable houses are very small. In order to realize how few the defaults actually are, one must compare them with the aggregate amount of bonds and notes outstanding. In 1906 corporation bonds and notes in the hands of the public amounted to approximately $15,000,000,000, while the percentage of defaults was 0.55 per cent. In 1920 there were outstanding about $24,900,000,000 corporation bonds and notes with a percentage of defaults of 0.45 per cent.

Furthermore, these figures of defaults do not mean that this percentage of one's bonds is worthless or even that this percentage of one's holdings will continue not to pay their interest over a given period of years; the corporations whose securities are in the default of principal or interest are generally reorganized and a very large proportion of the principal amount is saved. It must be remembered also that these figures include many securities that would not be recommended by the legitimate investment house and the net loss on carefully selected investments, therefore, is almost infinitesimal.

Milan R. Bump, president of the National Electric Light Association and chief engineer of Cities Service Company, in reviewing the central station industry of the United States for the past year, and commenting on the outlook for 1922, said:

"The electric light and power industry has come through the trying conditions of 1921 with a remarkable record of progress towards readjustment. While in certain industrial centres demands for power service fell off materially in the early part of the year, it is noteworthy that in almost every instance these losses were overcome before the end of the year. A large portion of the gains are of course attributed to the resumption of the industries previously served, but there has also been a marked gain in new customers. Domestic consumption continues to show gains and the field for electrically operated household appliances is constantly expanding.

"The change in the investment markets in the later months of the year has had a most beneficial effect and money is obtainable at rates which regulated utilities can afford to pay for the first time in several years. The result is that a general programme of expansion is now under way and I am confident that 1922 will break all previous records for development of plants and systems.

"The fact that the electrical utilities have successfully come through both the war and the subsequent reconstruction periods without an important failure has increased the standing of these securities as investments immeasurably. The coming year will be marked by many new and important bond issues to finance improvements, but a very large portion of the new funds needed will come from the sale of junior securities to the customers of the various local companies.

"The industry is not overbuilt for present conditions, which means that it must expand enormously to be prepared for the increased business which the gradual though unmistakable return towards normal industrial growth will demand of it. The electrical industry is progressing, and in my opinion 1922 will prove a banner year from every viewpoint, because the vision of all the leaders of the industry is such as to lead it both wisely and aggressively."

An offering of $15,000 City of Carmel-by-the-Sea park and playground 6 per cent. bonds, dated December 30, 1921, and due serially 1922 to 1936, is being made by the Freeman, Smith & Camp Company.

Carmel-by-the-Sea is situated on Carmelo Bay in Monterey County, about five miles southwest of the City of Monterey. It is a beautiful, well-built residential city having many nice homes and enjoying a steady, healthy growth. Because of its climate and wonderful scenic beauty it is considered one of the most ideal of California cities in which to reside. The ready accessibility by good paved roads has resulted in a decided increase in the growth of the city within the last few years.

This little issue of bonds is the only debt of the entire city and are authorized for the purpose of purchasing and improving a park and play grounds.

E. G. Elliott & Co., Inc., are offering stock at par value of $1 per share in the Prudential Petroleum Company, incorporated under the laws of the State of California, with a capitalization of $2,000,000. No promotion stock has or will be issued. The properties owned by the company consist of 160 acres owned in fee, situated in Kern County, from which over 80,000 barrels of oil were produced and marketed during the year of 1920. The company owns on this lease thirty-five producing wells. The income from this property alone is sufficient to yield a return of 7 per cent. on the issued stock. 320 acres in the Pecos Valley, Texas. 1695 acres in Red River, Bossier, and De Soto Parishes, gushers in this locality have been brought in flowing from 5000 to 30,000 barrels per day. 640 acres in Seven Lakes District, McKinley County, New Mexico; gushers are brought in in this locality at the remarkable shallow depth of 320 feet, costing but $700 to sink a well, where the Dutch Carter Oil Company, a subsidiary of the Standard Oil Company, now operating on adjacent property. A lease of 433 acres in Puente-Whittier District, Los Angeles County, which adjoins the Shell Oil Company holdings, upon which the latter is now drilling. A lease of forty acres in the Bixby Hills in Orange County. The Bixby Hills Syndicate is drilling on adjacent land and conditions are most favorable. The company just acquired a valuable lease on Signal Hill, Long Beach, only 500 feet from the now famous gusher Shell Well No. 1.

Julius Kruttschnitt, chairman of the executive committee of the board of directors of the Southern Pacific Company, in an article on "How to Better Railroad Conditions" in the current issue of the Railway Age, strongly advocates the concentration of the regulation of railway rates and railway wages in the same government body.

"Obviously," says Mr. Kruttschnitt, "there should be close cooperation between the revenue and expense controlling bodies, the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Labor Board, but we have seen one of these agencies order reductions of rates regardless of labor costs fixed by the government and material costs fixed by economic conditions, and another fix fictitious scales of wages violating economic laws and regardless of the ability to pay them. The framers of the Transportation Act meant well, but their intentions are defeated by faulty administration. To insure perfect coordination it is imperative that the same agency that controls revenues should also control expenses."

Mr. Kruttschnitt also opposes the repeal of the rate-making provisions of the Transportation Act which is provided for by bills which have been introduced in Congress.

"For many years when prosperity was rampant and all industries were making large profits," says Mr. Kruttschnitt, "those of railroads alone were restricted by law. Increases of rates were denied while increasing costs were steadily reducing the margin between income and expense. Financial starvation was to be checked by the Transportation Act, but before its influence could be felt the depression in business had set in and the rate increases allowed September 1, 1920, at the end of the guarantee period, were offset first by many reductions made voluntarily by the carriers to correct inequalities in the horizontal increase of rates, and thereafter by others made by the Interstate Commerce Commission, notwithstanding the statutory return on the value of the railroads had never been enjoyed and they were physically and financially unable to stand the reductions.

"During the years when business could easily have stood them the applications of the railroads for higher rates were repeatedly denied, and now when business can ill afford to pay existing rates and the railroads can still less afford to reduce them, they nevertheless are reduced and the owners of railroads are required to relieve those who feasted while they fasted. The average of forty high-grade securities as reported by the Wall Street Journal of December 28th is 83.50, compared with 83.55 November 28th and 73.85 on December 28, 1920.

Every period of violent price fluctuations, accompanied by like fluctuations in the use of credit, excites acrimonious controversy upon the subject of inflation and deflation. There is comparatively little protest against inflation, for the immediate effect of rising prices is to stimulate business, and everybody tries to recoup for the higher prices he must pay by pushing up his own prices or wages. A period of inflation is usually regarded as one of "good times," which so far as most people can see may last indefinitely, while a period

BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

In his talk the other at the Paul Elder Gallery Mr. Irwin commented on the fact that immediately after the war publishers would not accept serious books, on the principle that the public was "fed up" with reality and wanted romance. I remember a heading to the effect that the day of the problem play had set and that the public wanted "old-fashioned" romance—the same piece of poor prophetic psychology on the part of caterers to the public taste. The truth was that it took a universal catastrophe to shake the Anglo-Saxon world, at least, from its lethargic complacency and its childlike acceptance of fairy tales for facts. Mr. Irwin in his résumé continued that contrary to expectation romance did not take as its providers expected it would and that quite suddenly publishers and public became aware of the popularity of the Main Street school of fiction. Undoubtedly the Main Street, Miss Lulu Bett sort of thing was an outcome of the war, but so is depreciated currency and the 'flu. And one is about as salutary as the other. The school of fiction mentioned above is a result of depreciated imagination. Also it is feverish and insidious. And of the two it is better to be physically than mentally feverish, and it is better to be materially depleted than spiritually.

What the war—taken as a symbol of the cataclysm of our era—has done for literature is to show up the relative uselessness of most current books. It is either a singularly philosophic mind or a very dull one that can waste time on a garish novel whose theme is what Professor Robinson would call "animistic" when there is so much that is vital to be thought, even if not done. We may be hamstrung as to actual action, but at least we can spend our time more profitably than reading the puerile morbidity or such a book as, for instance, "Moon-Calf." On the other hand, no one can claim that "Moon-Calf" and its fellows are lightly recreative. They are simply the other end of the arc described by the pendulum, since it swung away from mid-Victorian prudery. And why any one should hail its ilk as an established precedent is mysterious, to say the least. What the publishers have finally discovered is that the intelligent public is tired of novels. When the pendulum makes another oscillation the novel may—or may not—come into its own again. The novel as an established form of writing is less than two hundred years old. There is not a single indication that it is a permanent literary form, although the few great novels that have been written are undoubtedly as permanent as any other books. But their value lies in their sincerity. They were the spontaneous product of their era—the most domesticated era of history, as the novel is the most domesticated form of written expression. And there are several indications that the novel is on the wane—as far as serious literature is concerned. Light fiction will probably hold its own with certain ages and classes.

The books that mark the extreme of the publisher's pendulum just now are books of reconstruction, and judging from the profusion in which they are published the public must be reading and demanding them. Easily in the forefront of those I have read is James Harvey Robinson's "The Mind in the Making" (Harper's; $2.50), which is not a psychological treatise, as its name rather unfortunately implies. It would be hard to classify "The Mind in the Making," though its subtitle makes a modest attempt. "The relation of intelligence to social reform" is how Professor Robinson designates his book. And the title refers to the fact that our minds are still unmade—the most optimistic thing that has been said about our gloomy status quo. There is hope yet.

"The Mind in the Making" is the result of Robinson's immense knowledge of history, anthropology, and psychology, plus his remarkably clear intelligence. The theme can be summed up as follows. When all the branches of human development reach the stage modern science has attained, civilization can really be said to exist. At present, with the single exception of science, we are but one remove or so from barbarism—witness the fact that philosophy, letters, architecture, politics, and government have made no advance since the age of Pericles. Contrary to our usual assumption that these things could not advance, since they were perfected then, Professor Robinson believes—and so does his reader by the time he has finished "The Mind in the Making"—that the fine and liberal arts have not progressed because we have not had the right attitude of mind. The Greeks knew something of science, too, but their knowledge of the natural sciences is barbarous compared to ours. We have accepted their civilization as the highest attainable by man—with the single exception of science—which necessity and evolution has forced us to make progress in. Our historian holds that when necessity or something else compels us to think differently about the other elements of civilization, that our progress will be as marked in those as it has been in scientific knowledge. All of this turns on constructive thinking as distinct from hazy, reminiscence thinking, or what is commonly known as day dreaming. Most of our lives are spent day dreaming—as most animals' probably are. Even our active thinking is usually not constructive, because most of it is endeavoring to prove something we want to prove. The correct attitude, as every scientific man knows, is to take all the facts and honestly let them tell their own story. Even the scientific method is fallible, but at least it is honest, which most of our thinking is not. I have tried to suggest the idea that Professor Robinson has put over in "The Mind in the Making," but the book is very much more than an exposition of that theme. It is one of the most worth-while books published this year, for it can not fail to have an antidotal effect on one's own dishonest thinking.

Three other books marked by a similar sincerity of purpose are "Manhood of Humanity," by Alfred Korzybski (Dutton; $3), "Democracy and the Will to Power," by James N. Wood (Knopf; $2), and "America and the Young Intellectual," by Harold Stearns (Doran; $1.50). The "Manhood of Humanity" is quoted by Robinson, and it has as a matter of fact the same aim "to point the way to a new science and a new art," as Korzybski defines his purpose. The striking difference between Korzybski's book and Robinson's is that the latter emphasizes our relation to animal life, pointing out that it is partly our wilful blindness to our animal heritage that has deflected the course of progress. As I understand Professor Robinson, the most man can ever become is a super-animal. Whereas Count Korzybski's contribution is that there is a difference of kind, and not degree, between man and the rest of the animal kingdom. I have not read "Manhood of Humanity," which is hailed by many authorities, particularly mathematicians and engineers, as an epoch-making book. Its sincerity is patent, however, and the fact that Robinson quotes it, sufficient recommendation for any one interested in the subject.

"Democracy and the Will to Power," which boasts an introduction by H. L. Mencken—a book of any conspicuity not introduced by H. L. Mencken will soon become a rarity—is an analysis of democracy, and not a recipe for Arcadia. "America and the Young Intellectual" is labeled "what the new generation expects of society," and is a sincere analysis of intellectual life and the lack of it in America.

All of these books and the many others of similar purpose show the real trend of thought since the war. All sensible people want to get down to bed rock and think as clearly as possible. We are not sure that it will do any good, but at least it will do no harm. The war has set us thinking, and somehow we must think it out. R. G.

Notes of Books and Authors.

William Dudley Pelley, author of "The Fog" (Little, Brown & Co.), wrote one of the seventeen short stories republished in the O. Henry Memorial Award Prize Stories for 1920, entitled "The Face in the Window."

With the revival of George Du Maurier's novel, "Trilby," on the stage, featuring Wilton Lackaye in the rôle of Svengali, has come a revival of the novel's popularity. When "Trilby" was published in 1894, hypnotism and mesmerism were a great mystery. Few people knew the power of mind over mind, but, with added enlightenment on this subject, the public is now reading the book with a fresh interest as evidenced by the fact that the Harpers have just made a new printing to meet the demand.

London dispatches state that, according to English opinion, W. L. George, the well-known novelist and feminist, has married a young woman who embodies all the finer traits of the heroines of his books. English society is commenting upon the marked resemblance of the erstwhile Miss Kathleen Geipel to the George heroines, adding, however, that she is an out-of-door type who has had none of the dramatic experiences which characterize some of them, especially Ursula Trent.

A translation has been made by Walter Geer and will be published shortly in London by Jonathan Cape. The same firm will also publish a book, written by Mr. Geer, entitled "Napoleon the Third: The Romance of an Emperor."

The first attempt to present to an English-reading public complete Japanese plays has been made by Leo Duran in a Seltzer publication entitled "Plays of Old Japan." The book contains five plays, which have been acted for centuries on the Japanese stage and are still being played there.

"Iphigenia in Tauris," recently performed by women students of Hunter College, will be published next spring by Knopf, together with three other plays by Mr. Bynner, in a volume to be called "Four Plays," by Witter Bynner.

The National Association of Book Publishers, which comprises practically all of the prominent publishing houses of the country, had a statement prepared and presented to the Senate Finance Committee concerning the question of duty to be levied on foreign books. American publishers do not want foreign books taxed heavily. On the contrary they claim that every foreign book imported to this country stimulates the domestic trade one thousand per cent. The book trade is unique in demanding that foreign competition be encouraged.

Putting up a Memorial, whether it is a simple Tablet or an elaborate Mausoleum, brings forth a multitude of queries—as to materials of worth and their producers. It is much the same as investing in a fine watch or mechanism. It can not be taken apart for critical examination. The thing to look for, then, is the reputation of the maker, his reliability and that of his product.

BRIEFER REVIEWS.

"More About Unknown London," by Walter George Bell (John Lane; $2), is a second volume in the style of "Unknown London." The author exhumes some little-known passages of English history and makes them live for us by his intimate description of the remaining evidence. For instance, he tells us that "Goldsmith furnished his chief apartment with Wilton carpet, blue moreen-covered sofa, and chairs corresponding, blue moreen curtains, chimney glass, Pembroke and card-tables, and tasteful bookshelves." For the reader with what Henry James called "the sense of the past" this collection of impressions of old London should be a welcome find.

Some twenty short papers reprinted from the Literary Review of the New York Evening Post comprise "Saturday Papers," by Henry Seidel Canby, William Rose Benet, and Amy Loveman (Macmillan Co.; $1). The general subject of the papers is a discussion of the status quo of literature in America, though literature is extended to include novels, movies, and reviews. These papers are both sincere and readable.

It is an open question whether or not the publication of letters never meant for the public and the reading of them is entirely ethical. But there are many people whose favorite literary diet is published letters, and for their benefit the Intimate Letters Series are published by Boni & Liveright. The letters published in this series all see the light of English print for the first time in that form—a fact that adds considerable éclat from the viewpoint of confirmed letter readers. The latest volume is "The George Sand-Gustave Flaubert Letters," which is translated by Aimée McKenzie. An interpretative introduction is written by Stuart P. Sherman. Among other things the letters have historical interest in their comment on such friends of the writers as Sainte-Beuve, Hugo, Gautier, and Turgenev.

Mr. Whiting Williams has already told us in "What's On the Worker's Mind" of his experience as an actual day laborer among American workmen. In "Full Up and Fed Up" (Scribner's; $2.50) he records a similar experiment among English laborers. This record of Mr. Williams' experience as a laborer, factory and mill hand in Great Britain constitutes a narrative of great importance in the understanding of labor problems. Mr. Williams has the unique advantage of seeing the laborers' life and work intimately, as one of themselves, and of being able to interpret it from his own viewpoint of a morale expert and a student of labor politics and problems. His books are among the most important published on the subject of labor because of his sincere disinterestedness and his unusual knowledge of the facts of his subject.

"The Complete Dog Book," by Dr. William A. Bruette (Stewart Kidd; $3), is a valuable reference book for dog owners. The care of dogs in health and their treatment in disease have been carefully covered and reliable prescriptions for specific diseases have been furnished. The book is replete with practical information that will enable a man to determine which breed is best suited to his wants and purposes and how to select a typical specimen. Particular attention has been given to the buying of puppies, and the prospective owner is told just what things to look for and what to avoid in making his selection. The author has fully described the dogs of America and Great Britain and the more special foreign breeds. Dr. Bruette is an authority of international reputation. He is the editor of Forest and Stream.

"Hero-Tales of Ireland," by Jeremiah Curtin (Little, Brown & Co.; $2), is a collection of old Irish folklore written in the fairy-tale fashion familiar to children rather than in the original Celtic style. The stories, though acceptable as fairy tales to youngsters, have the additional charm of the unfamiliar. "Hero-Tales of Ireland" comprises some of the best of Irish folklore and are full of the feats of magic and bravery that all lovers of fairy tales, as well as children, enjoy.

It is a far cry from Coventry to Indianapolis, where the name of Stuart Walker lends a rather factitious lustre to the theatre of the Middle West, but his portable Portmanteau Theatre is really not unlike the mediæval theatre on wheels that delighted the English provinces before and during Shakespeare's time. It is natural, under the circumstances, that as a playwright he should revert now and then to the themes of his brother craftsmen of the later middle ages and the early Renaissance, as he has done in "Gammer Gurton's Needle," one of the plays contained in the collection, "Portmanteau Adaptations," recently issued by the Stewart Kidd Company, Cincinnati. His adaptation of Still's old comedy has been very skilfully done. He has succeeded in making actable a really funny old comedy by a deft excision of passages too lively for a modern ear, and without injury to the current of the story or the quality of the wit. "Nelljumbo," one of the other plays in the book, is not an adaptation, but an original work by Mr. Walker, borrowing a certain external unity with Still's comedy from its having been written for adolescent actors. Like so many of Mr. Walker's things, it is a play for children, and meant to be acted by children or by the type of grown-ups who so often take this means of fostering in themselves, if not in their audiences, the illusion of youth. It is somewhat oversentimentalized, and one wonders in reading it, as occasionally with some of Mr. Walker's other productions, whether children are not too mature for this sort of thing. The very modern child play is apt to miss its purpose through neglect of the truth, well known to Barrie and Maeterlinck, that children are philosophers and very sturdy rationalists, within the limits of their experience. Every theatrical experiment, however, is interesting, and it is a pleasure to imagine these diversions being enacted under the quaint conditions of the Portmanteau Theatre. The book should prove very useful in school dramatics.

The Open Sea.

People used to wonder what Edgar Lee Masters believed in, noting the icy and passionless contempt for all the ways of men revealed in the verses that first made him famous. But since his visit to the old world, and his exchange of oblique forms of expression for an antique and definitive mode of saying things, we perceive what before could only be inferred through a glass darkly: that the chief object of his hatred is the dogmatist or "Puritan," and of his worship, the strong-handed emperor.

Such is his animus against Puritanism that he hunts it up and down the centuries, sniffing into remote corners of time for traces of the hated scent. He runs a Puritan to earth in ancient Rome, or thinks he does, in the person of Brutus, whom he portrays in "Brutus and Anthony" (the first poem in his new collection, "The Open Sea") as a sour doctrinaire, who destroyed the handiwork of a man infinitely his superior in strength and vision, when he dragged down Julius Caesar in mid-career, all for a bigotry called "Virtue" and an abstraction called "Liberty." Brutus and Anthony, as Mr. Masters portrays them, are two men misled, betrayed, and destroyed by illusions, Brutus by Virtue, and Anthony by Love. But the laurels are with Anthony because "he lived happier than Brutus, and left the old world happier for his life." This is Hedonism transported to a desperate extreme. Mr. Masters' exact quarrel with Brutus is explained more fully in one of the succeeding poems, an imaginary monologue by a contemporary of Shakespeare in the Mermaid Tavern. The speaker, who has the lineaments of a sixteenth-century Shaw, condemns Shakespeare for exalting a man with a negative and destructive creed above a constructive builder of empires.

In the dramatic sketch, "Charlotte Corday," the same theme is continued. When the murderess of Marat is arraigned before the republican tribunal Brutus comes in for it again, as responsible for the example that encouraged Charlotte to destroy an intellectual monarch for the sake of the same old deluded catchwords of "Virtue" and "Liberty." The Girondins are attacked by Mr. Masters with a bitter barrage of uncomplimentary epithets, and we are invited to look on what we have always considered the one redeeming nobility in Marat's sordid nature, his love of democracy, as his single blemish. The tragedy of Marat's life, as Masters sees it, was his stooping to traffic with the base demos, and the peculiar ignominy of his death consisted in being stabbed by a soured and sex-starved instrument of bigotry.

The New England poetical radicals will doubtless be highly gratified by the thesis here presented, but others will find it a mere inversion of the very quality it attacks. One has to be born in New England, apparently, to understand the peculiar complex under which the poets of the American Neo-pagan revolt are suffering.

The book is less arresting from the artistic viewpoint than from the tractarian, which was to be expected, under the circumstances. Mr. Masters falls very short of Browning (to whom he owes a great deal) in his ability to combine poetry and polemics. His blank verse shows familiarity with the Elizabethans, but a comparison would not be to his advantage. He handles the pentameter with lucidity and skill, but it breaks down under his touch into artificially spaced prose, without the memorable lines, or any of the resonance that the medium yields in the hands of a master. The whole source of the trouble may be, of course, that great verse can not be written in a mood of captious antagonism.

It is to be noted, however, that Masters is one of the very few members of the new school of verse who have the courage to meet the old poets on their own ground, and submit to the ordeal imposed by fixed prosody. The result shows clearly that he would at any time in history have been considered a remarkable verse writer. His work has always a hard, clear, and jewel-like brilliance of logic that gratifies the intellect, though it leaves the senses and the "emotions" untouched and the reason unpersuaded. To this there are one or two exceptions in the present volume, notably the fine poetic tribute to William Marion Reedy.

"THE TSAR'S BRIDE."

If you want to hear and see a performance by the Russian Grand Opera Company deeply steeped in Russian atmosphere and tradition—and the externals of costume and setting, as well—go on Friday night to see Rimsky-Korsakov's "The Tsar's Bride." From the rise of the first curtain to the close every scene, every setting, was intensely in keeping with the Russianess of Pushkin's old-fashioned story of love, and madness, and death. We are used to the conventional, hair-down-her-back, and prettily-mannered madness of Lucia, but although Marpha's insanity was not of a very different brand from Lucia's, the dramatic stage groupings and richly-colored stage pictures lent a hectic glow to the suggestion of the gentle Marpha's madness, and made the idea more poignant to the sensibilities.

The key of rich exoticism was pitched in the first view we had of a Russian interior in the time of Ivan the Terrible. The settings of "Pique Dame" were purely conventional. So were the costumes. A scene-painter and costumer of any nationality might have contrived them (except, perhaps, the scene of the rendezvous on the banks of the Neva). But when the curtain rose on "The Tsar's Bride" we saw a background that was as purely Russian as an ikon. The walls, richly colored with barbaric reds and their dependencies, were covered with great, curling arabesques interspersed, or rather terminating in, huge, conventional flowers. The artist had contrived a primitive richness of effect with scant materials, for there were few pieces of furniture in the room. Such as they were, however—a couch and the banquet tables set off with many brass candelabra—they amply carried out the idea of glowing color already established.

One figure, bearing out strongly the atmosphere of exotic richness of coloring, was alone on the stage. This was Mr. Lukin, the dramatic baritone, who assumed the rôle of Tomskey, teller of the tale, in "Pique Dame," of the three fatal cards.

Mr. Lukin really made a superb figure in his graceful and gorgeous coat of many colors, his full velvet trousers, his richly embroidered red boots, the gold-embroidered collar that framed his face something in the style of a Marie Stuart collar, and the small red-and-gold-hued cap that fitted the crown of his head in the style of the picturesque headgear worn by mediæval maidens when they were dressed to kill. These gorgeously bizarre fixings set off the fine physique. (Yes, sir-ee; physique is all right, in spite of some haughty scribbler having jumped on it and banished it from the language. But it's in the dic. I looked it up; and I find it altogether too convenient a word to submit to the unknown writer's dictum.) Well, to return to our muttons. Mr. Lukin, with jetty hair and beard, dramatic eyes, and a fine, high-bred, aquiline nose, was a specimen of superb human bric-à-brac that held our fascinated gaze whenever he was on the stage.

Two other interiors were contrived by the scenic artist, with the same richness of coloring, but different design, and an outdoor view of a section of the city had also a strongly national touch.

As to the costumes, while the dancing girls at Griassnoy's entertainment were rather calicoish in their general effect, later, in the palace of the Tsar, the court ladies were quite splendid in the tall, jeweled head-dresses that are so becoming to female beauty.

The story of "The Tsar's Bride" is one of evil plotting against innocence and joy. We learn of the existence of the "Oprichniki," who were a body of dissolute noblemen and courtiers bound together by evil vows who flourished at the court of Ivan the Terrible by virtue of their readiness to assassinate all who stood in the path of Ivan's terrible will. The presence of these gentry shed gloom and foreboding whenever they appeared, and they added much to the dramatic background of the play.

One would think, from such a story, that Rimsky-Korsakov's music would incline toward sombreness. But, on the contrary, the composer is polyglot in the variety of tongues his music utters. It gives the crystal note of innocence, it whispers softly of young love, it laughs with the silver laughter of youth, it chats with the village gossips, while it darkens to forebodings of evil and deepens to a splendid note of tragedy when tragedy looms. The story is old-style melodramatic tragedy, but the music, with its vari-colored interpretative flow, strikes the modern note. And it is ever and always so beautiful that it kept striking sparks of spontaneous applause from the delighted audience.

Except for a change of tenors, the cast was much the same as that of the opening night. But a week had gone by since then; a week of nightly performances very reassuring to the Russians of the favor they had gained from their American audience. All did better in "The Tsar's Bride"; principals, chorus, and orchestra. Miss Mashir's voice, and her handling of it, were both in better trim. The lady has a very fine organ, pure white soprano, and fine, full volume. Miss Bourskaya had splendidly dramatic scenes in which both voice and acting, not to mention the lady's rather striking appearance, conformed to the sombre emotions of Luba, the dark image of a woman scorned. Miss Mashir, also, acted well the rôle of the gentle Marpha, some gleams of whose innocent sweetness and joy survived the madness inflicted by the fatal philtre.

Mr. Busanovsky sang the tenor rôle of Likoff in a voice that conformed to the general standard, while Mr. Karlash's imposing basso, and the fine acting of the tall, personable singer, made considerable of an impression. The choruses were also well sung, although the male chorus still outshone that of the women.

There was a ballet; a long-skirted, high-necked, eminently proper ballet, which, presumably, danced in keeping with the times depicted. And, by the way, these Russian women are noticeably reticent, as compared to American women, about revealing their physical charms; which, nevertheless, exist in sufficiently ample measure. But the extreme is the American note at present with our women, who really horrify by their lavish display of bare skin and by their highly-colored make-up, foreign women who come to our shores.

"LE BOURGEOIS GENTILHOMME."

More and more do the productions of the Players Theatre, as productions, approximate the standards attained by the commercial theatres. It even becomes almost alarming. For this "little theatre" has a secure place in the regards of its clientèle, who are not at all anxious to see it bloom out into a successful blossom of the commercial world.

"Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" was staged so beautifully that when the curtain rose on the gracefully draped walls and doorways of Goodman Jourdain's mansion, and we perceived, against the deep, mellowed rose of its walls gorgeously liveried funkeys, velvet-coated gentlemen bowing deeply, and a group of dancers, their synthetically toned costumes harmonizing charmingly with the general scheme of color, we gasped in surprise, and for a moment wondered if the stage had been enlarged.

And this note of tasteful opulence struck in the first scene was maintained throughout the play. Whether it was the banquet scene, in which the two aristocrats pose in graceful contrast to the uncouth sprawlings of their parvenu host, or that in which the two mad-cap plotters transform Jourdain's mansion into the habitat of an Arabian Nights dream, every stage picture was characterized by beauty of color and composition, and fully in line with the traditions of the times. The production, in fact, is as ambitious as any yet attempted at the Players Theatre; rather more so, indeed, for the action of the sterling old comedy was set off by song and dance, the training of the ballet having been admirably handled by Katherine Edson, this energetic lover of the arts having also undertaken the rôle of Dorimene, the beautiful marquise, with commendable ability. The grace of Miss Edson's postures contributed greatly to the success of the stage pictures, for there the training of the dancer told.

There was some excellent dancing of a thoroughly professional stamp done by a well-trained ballet, with some toe-dancing by the pretty little première danseuse. Also, there were several pleasing vocal numbers—and here I would like to quarrel with the music leader for his inveterate habit of allowing the accompaniments to be too loud.

I have mislaid my programme, so can not give name to all others who figured so efficiently in the long cast, in the various departments.

Mrs. Kathleen Rucker's was, with her dark, glowing beauty, a highly decorative presence as the daughter and heiress of Jourdain, Virginia Sciaroni put plenty of snap into the proprietary indignations of Jourdain's wife, and Carolyn Green as Nicole accomplished such roudales of merry laughter over the comicality her master in his fine feathers that the house echoed them in delighted sympathy.

Carl Kroenke handled the important rôle of Jourdain, and, while this bright young actor is not up to the innumerable comic touches by which an experienced professional comedian would succeed in making Jourdain most ridiculous, he fully grasped the general concept of the character, and was consistently amusing throughout. There was, however, an anti-climax when Jourdain parted from his house negligé and donned his fine feathers, for he did not look quite comical enough to warrant Nicole's respectful hilarity; but that detail lies in the costumer's department. Not but what the costumer came out most brilliantly, particularly in the fecundity of his imagination in devising costumes for the Turkish magnates and their trains.

And here we must throw bouquets to the three young men who figured so effectively therein, and who not only spoke their lines well, but cut fine figures in their costumes. These were—well, the programme being missing, I must specify the very young actor as the one who recently played so well the rôle of Julius Caesar. Baldwin McGaw as Covisele also spoke his lines well, and, with his Turkish mate who so magnificently carried Jourdain's turban, threw themselves with abandon into the youthful mischievousness of the trickery, which went through whizzingly.

The handsome youth who was Dorimene's suitor played with appropriate flourish the rôle of a high-class flatterer of a middle-class money-box, Léon Bowen gave an admirable air of scholarliness to the philosopher, the dancing master made his limber legs as expressive as his tongue, and—well, I throw up the sponge. The cast was long, and nearly every rôle carefully acted and well spoken—but more names I am unable to remember.

The defects were comparatively few, which shows long and careful rehearsal. I was there on the second night, and the composite result in respect to speech was admirable. I noticed, to be sure, that the fencer's tongue did not equal in nimbleness his sword, and such mistakes as "oh-casion" for occasion, or the absence of the h sound in words beginning with wh were too common. I have even heard Arthur Maitland, who is generally correct, make this omission repeatedly. It is curious in people so keen-eared as the average enthusiastic player how often they obliterate that aspirated but indispensable letter. But these are small spots on a full-orbed sun. For, as compared with an average performance of the players, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" attained to a high rank. It was a worthy celebration of the tercentenary of the great Frenchman, and one of which the Players Club may well be proud.

As I came away I could not but think that this playhouse offers a healthy interest to youth. It is hard work, for many of the members have self-supporting day occupations; but it pays in the end, for not only are their faces and bodies much more graceful and expressive, but their enhanced acquaintance with dramatic literature can not but be intellectually profitable.

THE ORPHEUM.

Eddie Foy was first extant, on this Coast anyway, in "Sinbad the Sailor," a spectacular extravaganza in which the youth demonstrated his ability to be at home with his audience and supplied a shining mop of young hair to be pulled at by the comedian. Since then the stripling has multiplied himself by nine. (Doesn't 9x1 equal 9?) Anyway there are nine in the family, counting the latest acquisition.

Eddie Foy got a new grip on his public when he appeared on the stage with a family of small sons and daughters offering their juvenile entertainment. Vaudeville patrons adopted the whole family, and have enjoyed the novel sensation of seeing all of them grow bigger—in more ways than one—and some of them grow up; which is far more exhilarating than seeing popular favorites grow old.

Perhaps Eddie père will flinch at this suggestion. But Eddie has never grown old. He has merely grown up.

The time is coming, however, when vaudeville will be losing its adopted children. The grown ones are developing occupational preferences; not all of them for vaudeville. One, poor chappie, wants to be the owner of a big ranch. But he'd better try to secure the open-air life he longs for without trying to saddle his young back with ranch ownership.

However, before the family scatters, Foy père will settle the entire group in a play called "Family Pride." Then, after that experience is over, probably the group will disintegrate; and perhaps untoward experiences outside of vaudeville will reunite them some day. They are playing at the Orpheum this week, popular as ever, and with an added attraction; for the group tapers down to a new baby.

There is a comedy playlet on this week that will please those who like a touch of drama in vaudeville, for it has the Claire Kummer hallmark, and is played pleasingly by the young star, Sallie Fisher.

Besides these two headliners there is Lindsay, past master in handling his long, curling lash spectacularly, and a joyous group of "nuts" and singing and dancing partners, the novelty, besides Mr. Lindsay's act, being the "Flying Ginsbergs," who, with the outside aid of some of the "nuts," contrived mightily to entertain the audience.

"THE LIARS."

This sprightly comedy of Henry Arthur Jones, which is being played at the Maitland this week, seems a little demodé by time, until the imbroglío in which the recklessly flirting Lady Jessica has got herself neatly trapped is in full tilt, when the play skates along smoothly by its natural momentum and its characters are as modern as they make them. It has, though, some of the Henry Arthur Jones weaknesses. There is a certain ineptitude about the character of Mrs. Ebernoe, with her feeble fencing with the idea of perpetual constancy to a dead husband, when a would-be and very desirable live one is imperatively knocking at her door. But the complication and the culmination scene when all hands join in a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull altogether in lying Lady Jessica out of her predicament, is written with such brilliancy that it is all but actor-proof.

The situation is most interesting. It is what precedes such bitterly cynical comedies as "The Circle": a foolish pair of young moths hovering on the verge of fiery destruction at the hands of society.

Henry Arthur Jones' social conservatism is one of his most marked traits, and it shows strongly in the play and helps to mold the situation. It is a play which shows how easily the pleasure-loving life of worldly idlers may disintegrate their moral fibre. Although, as to that, Mr. Jones was thinking more of contriving an ingenious and amusing situation than of leading to a moral, strict conventionalist though he was and is.

It was very interesting to refresh our memories of a comedy which is associated with our earliest impressions of Margaret Anglin; and pleasant, too, to see again a play by Henry Arthur Jones. For he and Arthur Wing Pinero, whose names we instinctively bracket together, never failed to present interesting, stimulating, and well-contrived plots told in easy, unforced dialogue.

The principal burden of the acting was carried by Mr. Maitland and Miss Penman, Mr. Fee being absent from the cast, and the general company contributing conscientious endeavor instead of the drawing-room ease necessary for a comedy of the kind.

THE WILL IRWIN LECTURES.

Two lectures were given by Mr. Will Irwin this week, one on "The Art of Writing" and the other on "The Next War."

The day lecture was a cozy affair. It took place under the auspices of Paul Elder in the Paul Elder Gallery, and became a sort of conférence intime, under the genial influence of the lecturer.

Mr. Irwin made a sort of general survey of the place and influence of writers in the world, refusing to make a strict line of demarcation between the writer of literature and the journalist, since their writings so overlap each other.

His most noticeable conclusion, after he had delved into the early history of the business of writing, and, coming down to the present, had pointed out the tendency among writers of the day to use their gifts as a means of persuasion, was that the successful writer enjoys a disproportionate amount of fame, when compared to men who have risen high in other professions.

is a scientific theory nowhere better exemplified than in the Chinn-Beretta organization. The personnel of our staff is comprised only of men who have qualified as genuine optical experts worthy to assume the responsibility of dispensing Chinn-Beretta eyeglass service.

The lecturer acknowledged with a twinkling smile that the writer who commands his prices has an easy life, for he rarely can write more than three hours a day, is not irked my office confinement, and can live wherever he pleases. (That doesn't always work, though, for when Robert Louis Stevenson left the haunts of cultivated men and lived surrounded by Samoan natives his literary output immediately suffered in quality.)

The lecturer rather assumed that he had an audience of writers, since all the world has taken to writing, and the manifest cordiality of their feelings for him was probably increased because of his cheerful outlook on the profession. He gave a few sidelights on the creative faculty and its curious workings, and perhaps was instrumental in curing some few no-creative writers of the idea that they could train themselves to create. For certainly the creative writer is born, and not made.

Mr. Irwin's lecture on "The Next War" induced a more profound realization of the fearful terrors and deadly perils awaiting humanity en masse when that dread event materializes than we had hitherto experienced. That lecture may serve an object lesson illustrating Mr. Irwin's deduction that writers use their gifts as a means of persuasion.

This genial lover of humanity is using his great talents as a writer to persuade men against war. He has been using it thus ever since he saw the gray-green German flood pour into Belgium and lay waste an industrious and prosperous land. His writings reach many thousands of people. Let us hope that his book embodying the convictions expressed in the lecture will serve as one of the many doves of peace fluttering around the world, and help to hold back the human race from committing suicide.

THEATRICAL NOTES.

The Metropolitan Opera Company opened its fourteenth New York season with a banner audience. Standing room was at a premium, and the crowd was so great that the lobby and aisles were glutted with opera-goers.

Oddly enough, however, the audience, once it was seated, became quiet and unresponsive.

in its suddenly renewed perception that Caruso's familiar voice would be heard no more.

The opera for the occasion was "La Traviata," with Galli-Curci in the title-role. This diva is a favorite, and a favorite who is making approximately successful efforts to conquer her besetting sin of getting off pitch. But nothing, it seems, could stir the huge audience from its unusual lethargy, and it really looks as if, to New York opera-goers, the death of their favorite tenor was more than a nine days' wonder. Perhaps, after all, the New York theatre-going public can remember the dead.

Things are rather blue in the New York theatrical world just at present, which makes the success of "Kiki" stand out with enviable prominence. "Kiki," the title-role of which is being played with marked success by Lenore Ulric, is borrowed from the French stage, its original loud smell having been reduced to suit the American nose by Belasco, who has evidently made a curious mix-up of the original French atmosphere plus the American Belasco interpretation.

But it is the character of Kiki herself, which supplies a fat and juicy rôle for the Belasco star, which has hit the taste of New York right in the bull's-eye.

As Kiki, Lenore Ulric, we read, is at once delightfully good and provocatively naughty. She is "a sparkling enigma as she purrs and scratches her way into her audience's hearts. She is the most bizarre creature that has yet popped out of a clever playwright's Pandora's box." All of which means that Lenore Ulric has made an immense personal success in the rôle.

Players in the local theatres come and go, and sometimes, if they have talent or individuality, we wonder whither. Belle Bennett, formerly leading lady at the Alcazar, who began her two-year stay full of faults, and steadily improved month by month, is now, or was in November, playing at the Knickerbocker Theatre, New York, in a play called "The Wandering Jew." For her work in that evidently rather dull play she receives the following encomium from one of the prominent New York critics: (The play is) "acted conventionally by Tyrone Power, Helen Ware, Thais Lawton, and others. . . . Most of the acting is good enough, though bits of it are pretty bad. But with the beginning of the last act there appears on the stage a young actress named Belle Bennett, who is so simple, natural, sincere, and forceful that the play immediately comes alive. Tyrone Power appears to lose his artificiality while you give your attention to Miss Bennett, and in the scenes that follow . . . the thing turns into very impressive drama."

My Gawd! You don't mean to say that "The Skirt," which finally reached New York, has already departed. Readers of the New York Times have been noting with fascinated interest how many times "The Skirt"—then on its way to the Eastern metropolis—was mentioned as a coming attraction. Some of these readers even blue-penciled these items and kept count.

Bessie Barriscale, who it will be remembered appeared at the local Savoy in the piece before heading for New York, must have a hustling press agent, but was it all in vain? For "The Skirt" had a brief New York showing. Scarcely had it got there before again the oft-seen words "The Skirt" were visible in the columns of the Times, but this time to chronicle its disappearance. Such is fame; theatrical fame, anyway.

Miss Lillian Albertson a favorite actress on the Eastern stage—who, by the way, received her first favorable notice about a dozen or more years ago in the columns of the Argonaut on the occasion of her appearance in a programme played by pupils of a local dramatic school—rejoices that the long-absent gallery audiences are returning to their lofty perch. "It seemed to me," she said, "that with the gallery gone many of the fine old traditions of the playhouse had taken flight. . . . They are coming back, thank goodness. I see them every night up aloft, and it fills my heart with joy."

But we doubt if the gallery god, that youthful sovereign of joy who used to send his shrill whistle from on high, has, or ever will, come back. He has permanently gone over to the movies.

And those people up there in the gallery supply evidence of hard times and a resultant theatrical economy. Confirmed lovers of the theatre who have been driven out of the more desirable circles by hard times will climb up to the gallery rather than give up the theatre. That, we are convinced, is the real reason why the gallery is patronized once more. At any rate, it is in San Francisco.

JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

Miss Sarah Robinson, who did a great deal to improve the conditions of army life in the 'seventies, and was known as "The Soldiers' Friend," has died in England at the age of eighty-seven.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

The Columbia Theatre.

Readers of the Saturday Evening Post who read the delightful serial, "It Pays to Smile," by Nina Wilcox Putnam, and who knew May Robson, at once pictured her in the part of Freedom Talbot, the quaint, droll spinster who in middle life is forced by financial conditions to earn her living.

Freedom Talbot is of the old aristocracy of Boston, whose ancestors date back to the landing of the Pilgrims. Their old home in Boston is furnished in the old-fashioned style of fifty years ago and the two sisters, who live there, are the last to bear the family name. The sisters have never come in contact with the business world, and when Freedom, the youngest one, starts out to earn her living she surmounts every obstacle with her refinement and innate dignity, which in itself is the most wholesome, clean-cut comedy possible to imagine.

Miss Robson is fairly reveling in the part of Freedom, as it is similar to Aunt Mary, her first love. And with the quaint costumes and the old-fashioned side curls she is the personification of Boston's 400 of the old régime. In her travels over Europe she gets into all kinds of mix-ups, but with her keen intuition she brings everything around all right. The three acts take place in New York and California, all excelling in perfection and naturalness.

Augustus Pitou, Inc., under whose management Miss Robson has been so successfully handled the last few seasons, has won the reputation all over the country for having nothing but the best in everything, and any attraction sailing under the banner of Augustus Pitou, Inc., is a guarantee of wholesome amusement. "It Pays to Smile" will be here at the Columbia Theatre two weeks, commencing Monday, January 16th.

The Maitland Playhouse.

Arnold Bennett's dainty play, "Milestones," virtually a new production so far as the Coast is concerned, opens next Monday night at the Maitland Playhouse and promises to be one of the most interesting attractions presented here this season.

Bennett offers a new subject in "Milestones." It has to do with three generations in business: the older one that prefers the old ways, the middle generation that can see both sides to the question, and the impetuous younger generation that wishes to break all existing rules and branch out in daring style.

"Milestones" was the subject of much comment by dramatic critics when it appeared in New York, and highly praised as it has been, San Franciscans are frankly anxious to see it.

"The Liars," by Henry Arthur Jones, a comedy of social life that is exceptionally funny, is the bill this week, and will close with the Saturday matinee and evening performances.

Plans for the presentation of that greatest of the Actors' Guild successes, "Jane Clegg," by St. John G. Ervine, are under way. It will follow the Bennett play. "Jane Clegg" has never before been given outside of New York City.

The Orpheum.

Miss Lillian Shaw's dialect ballads of the Italian-American have come to be vaudeville classics. She opens her act with a Hebrew character song in which she has established herself as a comedienne. She sings with the necessary props a song of the woes and worries of a young mother, and from this theme gets a wealth of fun.

Newspapers throughout the country have conducted "ideal vaudeville" contests, giving fans an opportunity to express what in their opinion constituted the perfect vaudeville show. It is interesting to note that in the vast majority of these programmes the names of Gladys Clark and Henry Bergman appeared among the successful and therefore the most popular of genuine vaudevillians. These capable players made their reputation in the two-a-day. This year Miss Clark and Mr. Bergman are offering "Tunes of the Hour." They are assisted by the Dale Sisters, a pair of dancing sprites, who have graced many a programme with their own act. Miss Clark and Mr. Bergman are also ably assisted by Jack Landauer and Bobby Roth, who presides at the piano.

Joe Morris and Flo Campbell talk aviation. The airship that carries them through the gale of success is inflated with laughing gas, and the effect is enjoyed by every one within its radius. In their little skit called "Aviate-her" they sing and chat.

It is really remarkable how many innumerable ways the same thing can be done. This is the ground work on which so many acts are constructed, and yet no two of them are alike. William Demarest and Estelle Collette further demonstrate how entirely different these things can be done. They label their brand of amusement "Strings and Stringers."

There is still more or less doubt about the origin of man. Tarzan will create more speculation than a whole city of Wall Streets. There is, however, no doubt about the superfine quality of amusement he offers, nor of the sensation he creates.

Many of the best-known American artists have employed Nihla as a model and her perfect form is partly responsible for some of the finest paintings and statues of present times. Nihla, however, has been persuaded to pose for a while in vaudeville. With an electric novelty as a setting the combination of life and color in her act is magnificent.

Rodero and Marconi in the musical-comedy skit called "Quibs and Queries" offer a surprise. Rodero and Marconi have taken their unusual musical ability and turned it into novel channels. Instead of offering a straight musical act the playing is turned into an oddity. "Quibs and Queries" is mostly for fun, but there is a bit of real music, too.

Blanche Sherwood and brother are a good-looking young couple of speed and grace who have a clever aerial act called "Aviating Antics."

Miss Sallie Fisher and her capable company in the "Choir Rehearsal" will remain another week in their delightful skit.

"Wait Till We're Married" is the name of one of the newest and most successful Morosco productions. It is a laugh provoker of no mean qualities.

David Warfield, Ethel Barrymore, and Otis Skinner are among the stars for the next few months at the Columbia Theatre.

David Warfield in "The Return of Peter Grim" is announced as an early attraction at the Columbia Theatre.

The number of Arthur Balfour's accomplishments are legion. Not only is he that rare combination a philosopher and a statesman, he is that still rarer combination a philosopher and a sportsman. In fact there seems to be no conjunction of talents so antipodean but that Mr. Balfour's all-embracing genius can unite them. He is one of the most expert golfers in the United Kingdom—not strange, perhaps, as most English gentlemen are sportsmen. What is more unusual, he is one of the finest amateur pianists in existence. Though music and its cultivation chime well with a philosophic bent of mind. What is startling is Mr. Balfour's taste in music. His memory of classical music, which he plays without notes, is phenomenal, and his favorite instrument for their execution is the concertina. It is delightful to think of Mr. Balfour hurrying home from a conference at the best-known address in the world—No. 10 Downing Street—and hastening with some music-loving crony, whom he has picked up en route, to render Handel on an accordion to the accompaniment of said crony on one of Mr. Balfour's grand pianos. The Balfour entourage call his concertinas—of which Mr. Balfour always owns at least four—"the infernals." For the concertina in England, like the American accordion, is associated with the ragtime strata of society. But we are convinced that if Arthur Balfour finds beauty in them there is beauty there, for there are few men other than professional musicians so passionately fond of music and so musically gifted as Britain's greatest international statesman. In fact, we suspect that it was because of his great love of harmony that Arthur Balfour has remained a bachelor. Unless, perhaps, his celibate state is due even more directly to "the infernals."

The only lady bishop in the world has placed the blame of woman's immodesty on man's shoulders—where we suspect it rightfully belongs. Bishop Alma White, however, has not blamed man as such so much as man, the profiteer. The jeweler, the furrier, the hosier, are the tools of Satan sent to tempt vain woman. If a woman has a well-built upper torso she falls for a string of beads, be they pearls or paste, that offer an excuse for a bared neck. Having stripped her shoulders, she needs furs to protect them. The logic is surprisingly simple, and the New York Times' indignant rebuttal to the contrary, we agree with Bishop White. However, if the time should ever come when ladies' outfitters would not be almost exclusively men, if indeed they should ever be exclusively women, the condition would be precisely the same. For it is the sinister dollar that tempts man to tempt woman, and not any perverse and innate wickedness peculiar to his sex. When woman herself becomes the designer and provender of her sex's attire she will have to endure the entire onus of her own iniquity. An argument this that should induce the wily sex to leave well enough alone.

There is an epidemic of royal romance prevalent. Not only are rumors broadcast as to the future Princess of Wales, but even the young Duke of York is slated by public opinion for an early marriage. Popular opinion, always sensational, guesses at a double wedding at Westminster Abbey on the occasion of Mary's nuptials. It sounds like one of our favorite endings to a "high society" movie. And we suspect the English devotees of the "pictures" are even more sentimental than we are. A titled lady correspondent, writing in a New York paper, says that the royal wedding may indeed be a double affair—not so much in the interests of the spectacular as out of consideration for the sadly depleted royal budget. The princess' wedding will be an expensive affair. The king has decided on full dress, which includes tiaras for the ladies and uniforms of all orders for the men. Lady Decies writes, "The only other occasions on which full dress has been worn at the abbey within present memory were the last two coronations." But it is an ill wind that blows no good. If the royal household and the titled wedding guests are to have their slender incomes straitened still further by Mary's wedding, there is yet a law of compensation in the universe. The tradesmen will grow fat on aristocratic expenditure in the next few weeks. There will be work galore for the jewelers and dressmakers. And conversely a double wedding is a potential loss to the tradesmen. However, we suspect that both economy and romance will win the day.

Another royal marriage—probably one should say an ex-royal marriage—is in the air. The Kaiser's engagement is still more or less problematic, but so is the Duke of York's, up to date. Wilhelm's wedding is said to be planned with economy also. But probably what is economy with the master of Doorn would pass for splendid display at St. James. It is a pity that national sentiment and etiquette are so hidebound. Otherwise Wilhelm could offer to foot the bill for both weddings as a sort of private and penitential instaura-tion—a generous gesture with obvious advantages to all concerned. But noblesse oblige.

Somebody offers to give a diamond ring to the California woman who can show the most beautiful hands. When the winner shall appear it might be well, in the interest of aesthetics, to follow the example of the Chicago lady who, because her daughter's hands were so beautiful, decided to "have a bust made of them."

Announcement.

McCormick and McPherson announce that on January 1st Roger D. Lapham became a member of the firm and that the business of the firm will be continued as heretofore under the name of McCormick, McPherson & Lapham.

McCormick & McPherson, with offices in San Francisco and Los Angeles, have been engaged in the shipping and commission business for the past five years, having been operators of Shipping Board vessels, and are now the California agents of the Osaka Shosen Kaisha and the Los Angeles agents of the American Hawaiian Steamship Company, besides acting as local representatives for a great many private owners.

Lapham was formerly identified with the American Hawaiian Steamship Company, first as agent in Seattle, then as agent in Los Angeles, and afterwards as assistant traffic manager in San Francisco up to the time the American Hawaiian steamship service was discontinued in 1916 because of the war.

McCormick, McPherson & Lapham will also act as agents for the Texas Company (oil products) and will be prepared to deliver marine and other lubricating oils at the principal Pacific Coast ports, where they plan to establish permanent agencies.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

A boy and his mother were taking in the circus. Looking at the hippopotamus, he said, "Ma, aint that the ugliest damn thing you ever saw?" "Bill," said his ma, "didn't I tell you never to say 'aint.'"

A young man of the mountain district of North Carolina inherited a farm from his father. There were many difficulties about the title, so many as to dishearten the heir. "I am having so much trouble," he explained, "that I almost wish father had not died."

"Johnny," said his mother severely, "some one has taken a big piece of ginger cake out of the pantry." Johnny blushed guiltily and fidgeted around. "Oh, Johnny!" she exclaimed, "I didn't think it was in you!" "It aint all," replied Johnny; "part of it's in Elsie."

A small girl asked her mother: "If I grow up, will I have a husband like papa?" "Yes, my dear," mother replied. "And if I do not get married, will I be an old maid like Aunt Susan?" "Yes," was the reply. The little girl thought for a minute, put her hands to her head, and said: "Well, I am in a fix."

Mrs. Worth had just learned that her colored workwoman, Aunt Dinah, had at the age of seventy married for the fourth time. "Why, Aunt Dinah," she exclaimed, "you surely haven't married again!" "Yassum, honey, I has," was Aunt Dinah's smiling reply. "Jes' as of'en as de Lawd takes 'em, so will I."

An attorney of Los Angeles advertised for a chauffeur. Some twenty-odd responded and were being questioned as to qualifications, efficiency, and whether married or single. Finally, turning to a negro chap, he said: "How about you, George, are you married?" Quickly the negro responded: "Naw-sir, boss, naw-sir. Ah makes mah own livin'."

The late William M. Evarts valued himself less as a lawyer and a senator than as a farmer. Upon one occasion he sent to then Chief Justice Waite a ham from his farm and at the same time a copy of an oration he had delivered upon a former justice of the Supreme Court. He wrote: "I am sending you one of my prize hams, also my eulogy on Chief Justice Chase—both products of my pen."

Here is another sample of muckraking directed towards juries. A lawyer had a somewhat difficult witness, and finally asked if he was acquainted with any of the men on the jury. "Yes, sir," replied the witness, "more than half of them." "Are you willing to swear that you know more than half of them?" demanded the lawyer. "Well, if it comes to that, I'm willing to swear that I know more than all of them put together."

Ben Sachs, a Philadelphia lawyer, is responsible for this anecdote: "Vell, Ike, my poy," said Sol to his son, "I've made my vill and left it all to you." "That's very good of you, father," remarked Ike, eyeing him suspiciously. "But, bless you, it cost a lot of money for the lawyer and fees and things!" "Vell?" said Ike more suspiciously. "Vell, it aint fair I should pay all dot, is it? So I'll shust take it off from your next month's salary."

A popular Oklahoma City salesman recently married, and was accompanied by his wife as he entered the dining-room of a Texas hotel famed for its excellent cuisine. His order was served promptly, but the fried chicken he had been telling his wife so much about was not in evidence. "Where is my chicken?" he asked somewhat irritably. The dusky waiter, leaning over and bringing his mouth in close proximity to the salesman's ear, replied: "Ef youse mean de li'l gal with blue eyes an' fluffy hair, she doan' wo'k heah no mo'."

"I say," roared the irate citizen, as he bounced into the office of the village weekly, "where's the editor?" "Want to see him personally?" queried the office boy. "Of course I do," answered the irate citizen. "I'm going to thrash him within an inch of his life. See?" "Oh, all right," answered the boy. "Just take a seat, please. There are three others ahead of you. If you watch you will see 'em chucked through the window one by one. When the third comes down, you can go up." But the visitor had changed his mind.

"The Germans are pariahs." The speaker was Marcel Prevost, the French novelist. He went on: "A German profiteer spent the month of August at the Kulm in St. Moritz—the Swiss Engadine, you know. One afternoon he pushed himself in on a group of American ladies round the wood fire in the hall, for St. Moritz is 6000 feet high, and it's often cold there in August. A Chicago girl was in the group, and on the German's arrival she whispered something to her mother. 'I think you're very rude to whisper,' the German said to her jocosely. 'Yes, but you'd think me ruder still,' said the Chicago girl, 'if I said it out loud.'"

Daddy came home from the office early one evening, and mother had not returned from some friends whom she had been visiting for tea. Little four-year-old Gwennie ran up to her father's side. "Daddy," she cried, "I've been wanting to see you for a long time when mother's not near." "Why, my little girl?" asked the father. "Well, dad," answered Gwennie, "please don't tell mother, because she's an awful dear, but I don't think she knows much about bringing up children?" "What makes you think that?" asked her father. "Well," replied Gwennie, "she makes me go to bed when I am wide awake, and she makes me get up when I am awful sleepy."

A senator, asked why he opposed a certain public utility bill which involved millions of dollars, answered: "I oppose this thing because I have no confidence in the gang that is behind it." "You see," he continued, "these fellows don't inspire me with the same trust that a certain witness inspired in the county judge, before whom she appeared. 'Your name, madam?' the judge asked the witness. 'Matilda Hawkins, sir, age forty-six,' came the prompt reply. 'Well, really, that is astonishing!' exclaimed the judge, and addressing the jury, he added: 'Gentlemen, please take note of that answer, and because of it I will ask you kindly believe everything Mrs. Hawkins has to say.'"

The oldest good story is the one about the boy who left the farm and got a job in the city. He wrote a letter to his brother, who elected to stick by the farm, telling the joys of city life, in which he said: "Thursday we auto'd out to the country club, where we golfed until dark. Then we motored to the beach for the week-end." The brother on the farm wrote back: "Yesterday we buggied to town and baseballed all the afternoon. Then we went to Ned's and poked until morning. Today we muled out to the cornfield and geahawed until sundown. Then we suppered, and then we piped for a while. After that we staircased up to our room and bedsteaded until the clock fived."

Following the adjournment of the Peace Conference in Versailles, M. Jusserand, the French ambassador, returned to America on the same trip of the George Washington which brought President Wilson home. Whether in honor of the victorious nation represented on the passenger list, or whether in simple bad taste, moving-picture entertainments were provided for each evening of the voyage. Now no one is above moving pictures, be he of whatever walk of life you may name, providing the movies represent any walk of life. But these movies were of the most obnoxious propaganda type, showing war as war never was or ever hoped to be. M. Jusserand, along with the President and others, provided a patient nightly audience to these affairs. "You—you like these movies, Monsieur Jusserand?" a fellow-sufferer asked after one performance. The ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to America from France looked out over the rolling Atlantic: "I have crossed this ocean some dozens of times," answered he. "And never—until I witnessed the cinema below—have I come near to being sick."

THE MERRY MUSE.

Her Vanity Case.

When she stopped at the market, or paid social calls,
She took out her vanity case,
She used it in old university halls,
While they lectured on Einstein and space;
And entering church, as she dropped on her knees,
She'd powder her nose just a bit, if you please,
And her cheeks would grow pinker by several degrees
When she took out her vanity case.
Men hustled her furniture out of the fire;
She took out her vanity case
And sat on the curb as the flames mounted higher
And daintily fixed up her face;
The house was insured, never mind if it burned,
The firemen and neighbors seemed too much concerned!
To bear things with calmness was easily learned
When she took out her vanity case.
But one day she died, and her kindred all said,
"Shall we take out her vanity case,
Or leave it with her in the coffin? Though dead
She'll rise from her burial-place
And restlessly wander for many a year
With groanings and moanings to find it, we fear;
No, let us make sure in some happier sphere
She can take out her vanity case."

—Pearl Whitney in Judge.

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

Cycol will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of Cycol as shown on the Cycol Recommendation Chart. Use Associated gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

The other afternoon (says Figaro) a Russian admiral saw in a taxicab a gallant general of the heroic hours of the war, and on the open boulevard embraced him and gave him the kiss of peace. Another even more touching scene occurred in a modest restaurant where the "students who study" meet. At a table three Polish women students were installed. A waitress of rather advanced age drew near; despite her humble dress she had a lofty air. The students looked at her attentively, and suddenly one of them rose, knelt down and kissed the edge of her apron. This servant had formerly been a lady of honor at a court that was wrecked in the most awful drama of contemporary history.

Bees in California make one-seventh of all the honey produced in the United States, is asserted in a bulletin issued by the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce. It is estimated that the 1921 crop will require fifty trains of fifty cars each for its transportation. While no exact figures can be given, says the bulletin, it is believed there are not less than 700,000 colonies, or hives, of bees in California. Europe draws heavily on the United States for honey and in 1919 an amount equal to the entire California production was shipped abroad.

CURRENT VERSE.

The Iron Music.

The French guns roll continuously
And our guns, heavy, slow;
Along the Ancre, sinuously,
The transport wagons go,
And the dust is on the thistles
And the larks sing up on high . . .
But I see the Golden Valley
Down by Tintern on the Wye.

For it's just nine weeks last Sunday
Since we took the Chepstow train,
And I'm wondering if one day
We shall do the like again;
For the four-point-two's come screaming
Thro' the sausages on high;
So there's little use in dreaming
How we walked above the Wye.

Dust and corpses in the thistles
Where the gas-shells burst like snow,
And the shrapnel screams and whistles
On the Bécourt road below,
And the High Wood bursts and bristles
Where the mine-clouds foul the sky . . .
But I'm with you up at Hyndcroft,
Over Tintern on the Wye.

—Ford Madox Hueffer.

Vistas.

As I walked through the rumorous streets
Of the wind-rusted, elm-shaded city
Where all of the houses were friends
And the trees were all lovers of her,
The spell of its old enchantment
Was woven again to subdue me
With magic of flickering shadows,
Blown branches and leafy stir.

Street after street, as I passed,
Lured me and beckoned me onward
With memories frail as the odor
Of lilac adrift on the air.
At the end of each breeze-blurred vista
She seemed to be watching and waiting,
With leaf shadows over her gown
And sunshine gilding her hair.

For there was a dream that the kind God Withheld, while granting us many—
But surely, I think, we shall come
Sometime, at the end, she and I,
To the heaven He keeps for all tired souls,
The quiet suburban gardens
Where He Himself walks in the evening
Beneath the rose-dropping sky
And watches the balancing elm trees
Sway in the early starshine
When high in their murmurous arches
The night breeze ruffles by.

—Odell Shepard.

Three Quatrains.

I.

As long as Fame's imperious music rings
Will poets mock it with crowned words august;
And haggard men will clamber to be kings
As long as Glory weighs itself in dust.

II.

Drink to the splendor of the unfulfilled,
Nor shudder for the revels that are done;
The wines that flushed Lucullus are all spilled,
The strings that Nero fingered are all gone.

III.

We can not crown ourselves with everything,
Nor can we coax the Fates for us to quarrel;
No matter what we are, or what we sing,
Time finds a withered leaf in every laurel.

—Edwin Arlington Robinson.

The Dark Cavalier.

I am the Dark Cavalier; I am the Last Lover;
My arms shall welcome you when other arms
Are tired;

I stand to wait for you, patient in the darkness,
Offering forgetfulness of all that you desired.

I ask no merriment, no pretense of gladness,
I can love heavy lids and lips without their Rose;

Though you are sorrowful you will not weary me;
I will not go from you when all the tired world Goes.

I am the Dark Cavalier; I am the Last Lover;
I promise faithfulness no other lips may keep;
Safe in my bridal place, comforted by darkness,
You shall lie happily, smiling in your sleep.

—Margaret Widdemer.

The Bavarian cabinet has proposed a law that will sentence to imprisonment and to a maximum fine of 100,000 marks persons found guilty of gluttony. Foreigners found guilty are to be deported after serving their sentence. The law threatens to be very unpopular.

A Reuter message from Paris says that General Gouraud has informed the Academy of Inscriptions et Belles Lettres of an important discovery made by M. Moutet, who was sent by the Academy to carry on archaeological work in Syria. In the course of excavations on the site of the ancient city of Byblos, what appears to be the entire treasure of an early Egyptian temple has been laid bare only three feet below the surface of the ground. Among the objects discovered are statuettes in bronze, gold, ivory, and bronze ornaments, crystal and cornelian beads, gold coins, and an alabaster vase, intact, mentioning Pharaoh Hounas of the fifth dynasty, who reigned some 2500 years before the Christian era. The discovery is of particular interest, as it proves without a doubt that the Egyptian penetration into Syria took place at a very early date.

Paul Elder Lectures.

Dr. and Mrs. F. Homer Curtiss, formerly of New York, will give a series of seven private class lessons, Monday and Thursday afternoons, at 2:30 o'clock, in the Paul Elder Gallery, on "The Origin and Meaning of Numbers and Symbols." The first lesson, January 16th, will be "From the Unmanifested to the Manifested," giving the origin of numerical systems and why symbols—cosmic, national, local, and personal—are necessary.

The lecturers are authors of many widely-read volumes, including "Realms of the Living Dead," "The Key to the Universe," "The Voice of Isis," etc. Their new book, "The Message of Aquaria," is just being published.

Dr. and Mrs. Curtiss, after spending a year in San Francisco and carefully studying conditions here, have decided to make this their home in preference to all other places. They have just let the contract for their residence to be erected in St. Francis Woods. Their lectures are under the direction of Paul Elder.

The elaborate costume of both men and women in the reign of Queen Elizabeth was profusely ornamented with needlework; even the fine linen shifts of ladies of high degree might have the upper part and the sleeves covered with minute embroidery in colored silk. Jackets, bodices, and bodice fronts were treated with repeating ornament of silk embroidery, often enhanced with gold and silver thread and spangles, the richness culminating in the cap-shaped headdress, where the work was closer and had a larger proportion of the gold and silver thread and shining ornaments. Mediæval Italy was also rich in works of embroidery, with a wide range of treatment and application to purpose; France was the home of beautiful work, keeping pace with England in mediæval and later times, and even surpassing her in delicate and gorgeous work, especially in the way of ecclesiastical vestments.

The Germans are said to have discovered a cure for sleeping sickness. The drug, which is potent within a month, is unknown to scientists elsewhere.

France's International Exhibition.

France will retake her position as arbiter of the world's art destinies in the spring of 1923, when the great International exhibition which was postponed by the war is scheduled to open in the Grand Palais unless the cubists and other modernists create an opposition stronger than they did when the project was first mentioned in 1914 (says the New York Herald).

Armand Dayot, Inspector-General of Fine Arts, is behind the movement and has already obtained assurance of governmental support, although it will be necessary for two Parisian salons to find a temporary home elsewhere, as the exhibition will last from May to October.

While not professing Communist tendencies, Dayot is a firm believer in the international system if applied to art, and it would rid the world of much of the rubbish now being shown at smaller exhibits if a definite standard whereby to measure art is devised, and this is only possible, he says, by a comparison of the best efforts of all nations.

Before the war, Germany was on the point of organizing a great international art show. In fact the exhibition in Munich, where France was well represented in 1914, was to have been expanded along the lines now adopted by Dayot. In order to uphold French supremacy it is intended to devote at least half of the Grand Palais purely to French art, showing not only modern ideals, but giving an artistic résumé of the guiding influence of the last twenty-five years.

It will be more than a display of paintings, however, for Dayot favors showing samples of French sculpture and architecture and of the decorative arts of all nations, and is calling to the attention of art experts the valuable result obtained at American exhibitions where something more than paintings are offered for public and official inspection.

The present plans would accord the entire balcony to the American section, much of which will arrive next summer for the American arts exhibition now being planned by Julian Clarence Levy, a New York architect, and a group of American artists. Although it has not been decided whether the Grand Palais is to be donated for a purely American display, the art world as represented by the Beaux Arts is expressing great interest in its development, believing that it will be an excellent index as to the effort to unite the inspirations of painters, sculptors, and decorators from all parts of the world.

Before embarking for India the Prince of Wales visited the castle of Oakham in Rutland. And following an old tradition he had to pay the tithe. This tradition, over three hundred years old, is one of the most curious. It imposes upon the visitor of note—for whom alone the gates are opened—the obligation to offer a horseshoe. The Prince of Wales did not ignore this custom. His horseshoe was placed above the first that figured in the collection, and which was received from the hands of Queen Elizabeth.

"Who is your favorite movie heroine?" "My wife—she sits through them all."—Judge.

From the Cabinet to the "Movies."

There is no political significance in the resignation of Mr. Hays from the cabinet to go into the movies. Hays has not been a large influence in his relations with the Administration. He has done a kind of work little related to Administration purposes other than along the line of practical working efficiency. He has done good work—very good work. Under his hand the Postoffice Department has been reorganized, re-inspired with energy, relieved of the offensive partisanship and the still more grievous meddling with private affairs that marked the administration of his predecessor. Hays is not disgruntled; on the other hand, he has worked harmoniously with the President and his associates in the government. He leaves the department with good-will all around. The case is a very simple one. Hays is a young man (only forty-two) and without private fortune. There comes along an industry offering him a salary of $150,000 per year, with a contract for three years and with a still longer period in prospect. A man would be something less than human who would decline such an opportunity to establish his fortunes, particularly as the work to be done is in direct line with his proved capabilities, and at the same time affording opportunity for vital moral service. The movies are taking Hays because he will be worth all that they propose to pay him and something more. The business has gotten into bad shape. It has fallen into moral discredit. The Fatty Arbuckle case and the tendency among film producers to exploit sex interests have combined to injure the business of making and exhibiting moving pictures. There is a rising tide of public disapproval that threatens to destroy or at least to limit the business. This is manifest in proposals in many of the states for more rigid censorship. The wiser ones in the industry realize that something must be done to turn the tide. They need first of all a reorganizer. And more than that, they need an exhorter of the moral uplift type. Will Hays fills the bill. His personal propensities are all for things that are worthy as distinct from things that are vicious. As a director-general of the movie world he will have a large sphere of influence, and there is not the first doubt that he will exercise it with the highest motives and in efficient ways. It may easily be believed that much of the appeal made to him lay in its opportunity of extended moral influence.

Legislation and Politics.

There is an old story of a Western senator whose son reported to him from the home state that the Populists were making tremendous gains therein. "I am going out there," remarked the senator to a colleague, "and look into the situation." "What will you do when you get there?" asked the colleague—"Start a fight against them?" "No sir-ree! If what my boy tells me is true I'll jine 'em." Something of this idea appears in the mood of the Administration at Washington relative to certain conditions currently related to legislation—and politics.

There are indications that the Administration is about to deal with the agricultural bloc by "jining" it. President Harding is sincerely sympathetic toward the farmer. Although professionally a publisher, he is of the farmer class. But he is resentful of what the bloc has done to him and his administration. At bottom he does not like it. But just now he is at a disadvantage. The bloc refuses to give over its purposes. But for the sake of harmony it may yield a little. If there is to be harmony the Administration, too, must yield a little. It is to be either a fight or compromise. There is in the situation the look of compromise. It is not likely to go far. Mr. Harding may temporize, but he is not likely to violate his fixed judgment, often declared, that group or bloc politics is essentially wrong, inevitably destructive to the party principle in government; therefore as related to our system fatal to integrity and efficiency in government. That he will enter into any hard-and-fast deal with the bloc is not easily believable; and the chances are that when it comes to close grips he will be found fighting it.

Then there is the matter of the bonus. Secretary Mellon believes that it is indefensible. The President, if he would speak his inside mind, is probably of the same opinion. Notwithstanding, the bonus is on the party programme and in one form or another it is to go through. There is no doubt as to that, since it is supported by both parties in Congress. Explanation lies in the declared judgment of Chairman Adams of the national committee and of other party leaders in the Middle West that something in the nature of a bonus is necessary for the purposes of the coming November election.

Before adjudging the President's concessions too severely it would be well to bear in mind that the government of the United States is in its nature representative. It is not the personal possession of the President, subject either in the practicability of things or in morals to the will of the Administration at Washington. There have been those in recent times who have thought it to be just this, but there is little in their experience to justify stiff-neckedness on the part of the President or his Cabinet. If the country wants the bonus, and by the tests of politics it seems to want it, then those who are in authority have at least a species of justification for yielding. True, it is not the kind of justification to be pleaded effectively by political idealists. But political idealists, while they have their place—and a very worthy one it is—usually make a small figure when it comes to the actualities of politics. And whether we like or not, whatever rules in the sphere of politics inevitably rules the country.

Whoever has had anything to do with the working of government under the representative principle—or whoever has closely observed the same—knows that idealism does not "go" in the political world. Further, they know that efficiency is no more characteristic of representative government than is idealism: Since popular government must pretty definitely reflect prevailing popular moods, it is inevitable that it should be marked by temporizing courses and by many forms of waste. Government by the people, while undoubtedly the most righteous form of government, is necessarily at times weak-jointed. The ideals of liberty and high standards of efficiency are not concurrently attainable.

None the less, we think a grievous mistake will be made if the bonus project goes through—a mistake of many serious angles. It will embarrass the national finances and hold back return of the country to normal conditions. Bad as that will be, it is a less serious consideration than the permanent moral effects to follow. What these effects are bound to be has already been defined in these columns. It is enough now to say that the bonus will tend to demoralization all round. The government that gives and the man who receives will both suffer in dignity and respect. The government which consents that its ideals and its interests are not worth fighting for on the part of its citizens, serving without money compensation, to a degree lowers its flag. The citizen who accepts a gratuity on account of patriotic service, in four cases out of five unearned, makes a distinct sacrifice of self-respect; and with it loss of what should be the highest of patriotic inspirations. A concession made outside the bounds of justice and obligation, and in behoof of politics, is a mark of weakness and far from being an edifying spectacle.

The Fall of Briand.

The news writers tell us that Briand by his notable speech before the French Parliament last week won the majority to support of his policies and of his course at the Cannes Conference, and that then—with the ball at his feet, so to speak—he resigned. It is true that the French temperament is notably different from our own, but fundamentally human nature is pretty much the same in all lands. Credulity does not go to the point of believing that Briand, who dearly loves office, resigned it when he had the game in his own hands. It is much easier to believe that he was conscious of the fact that applause is one thing and votes quite another. It is not credible that he abandoned the premiership while he had the power to retain it.

In France premiers and cabinets follow each other under motives difficult of comprehension by the soberer peoples of America and Britain. We can see no reason why the administrative organization at Paris should not have the stability characteristic of the corresponding organization at London. In both cases premier and cabinet—"the government"—are responsible to representative parliaments. In the former case a definitely organized government usually goes on for years. In the latter it seems likely to fall at any hour; in fact, does fall with almost every change of the moon. Explanation lies in the character of the two peoples. The English are homogeneous, loyal to the powers that be, prone to steadfastness in support of established authority. The French, no less homogeneous, are easily moved, emotional, flighty, temperamentally disposed to change. The British habitually support their leaders. Though they may belabor them with criticism with reproaches, they stand pat. The French, on the other hand, seem to delight in knocking down whatever is in a position to be knocked down.

Here we have the explanation of why England has the more stable and consistent government, and why its administrative leaders hold high rank in international councils. France abounds in a certain kind of personal distinction, but it affords no basis for authoritative statesmanship. A man who knows that in office he stands on insecure ground, that the chances are nine to one that his neck is destined in short order to go under the parliamentary guillotine, is apt to be either timid or reckless. France has only herself to blame that in these momentous times, as in times of less import, she is without the leadership of poised and authoritative statesmanship.

If now and again we lose something of dignity under the fixed tenure of our statesmen, as illustrated in the case of President Wilson and his dealings at Versailles and at home, there are in the situation certain compensations. At least it is known for what periods President and Congress may pledge the country. If under our system we fail at the point of continuous policies, our statecraft is not subject to the sudden and violent revolutions that paralyze the hand of government at Paris. It is only when an American President exceeds his plain mandate that his pledges or assurances may be discounted.

The Newberry Case.

The fact that a great sum of money—estimated at a quarter-million of dollars or more—was expended in promoting the senatorial candidacy of Mr. Newberry is not a pleasant one. Yet there is no proof, even no allegation, that money was spent corruptly. Nobody charges that votes were bought. The money went for publicity in various forms and for employment of speakers and other campaign workers. The sole indictment was that so large a sum was expended as to make the campaign in effect a "money fight."

Assuredly money fights in politics—and in the immediate instance money was spent on both sides—are not edifying. If not actually corrupt, they smell of corruption. Beyond a doubt they tend to corruption. Yet it is difficult to see how a senatorial campaign in a state of large population can be carried on without a considerable expenditure. The voting public ought to know anything and everything tending to the qualification of those who stand for public office. How in the name of all the saints are the principles, the views, and the policies of a candidate to be put before a million or more voters without a vast deal of publicity? If there is little or no publicity, voters must act in the dark. If there is sufficient publicity to enable the people to vote intelligently there must be widespread exploitation—and this costs money.

As a matter of fact pretty much every candidacy of this kind is in one way or another supported by a costly campaign. We have only to glance at the record in our own state to see how it works. When our own Hiram was a candidate for the Senate state officials, working in his behalf, spent time for which the state paid traversing the length and breadth of California—"from the Siskiyou to San Diego, from the Sierras to the sea," to employ a familiar and favorite figure. But this is not all. The senator himself, accompanied everywhere by troupes of admirers—many of them in state employment and pay—moved up and down in two speaking campaigns. Halls were opened, brass bands brayed, tar barrels were lighted. All of which cost a vast deal, the money being found by passing the hat, the candidate himself being a man of limited financial means. Take the case of Mr. Phelan. Here again there was a kind of exploitation that must have cost many, many thousands of dollars. Alone, the bill for electric lights by which the senator's name was emblazoned, likewise from the Siskiyou to San Diego and from the Sierras to the sea, must have run into heavy figures. To be sure, there was no passing of the hat in the case of Mr. Phelan, since he is a man of personal wealth and has wealthy family connections. We are asked to believe that no part of this vast expense was paid by Mr. Phelan himself. But somebody must surely have paid it. Electric signs, brass bands, town halls, with all the elaborate paraphernalia of campaign exploitation, are not had for nothing. The common explanation is that members of Mr. Phelan's family put up the money. However this may be, it is certain that money in large sums was spent. In the case of

Mr. Shortridge there were fewer evidences of expenditure. But that a good deal of money was put into campaign activities is obvious. Here again there was a case of passing the hat. And that it was done successfully was plain to every observer.

It is possible that there may be among the ninety-six members of the Senate somebody whose election came about without expenditure above and beyond the narrow limit allowable to a candidate under the law. But we doubt it. However is it possible for a man under the present system of electing senators to make himself, his principles, his views, his policies known to the people other than by methods that cost money? There is no possible way. Either a candidate must remain unknown at the point of his qualifications or somebody must pay the bills essential to his exploitation before the voting public.

In the case of Mr. Newberry the expenditure, large though it was, was provided by his personal and political friends. He has given his solemn word that he himself contributed not a single dollar to the campaign fund; at the time he was absent from home engaged in war service. Mr. Newberry is entitled by his long-sustained high character in public and private life to be believed. The majority of the Senate did believe him.

To understanding of the Newberry case it is necessary to know something of the motives of the movement to discredit his election. It was not initiated by the rival candidate, who probably was in the position of the pot that had the best of reasons for not calling the kettle black. Here is the story as detailed by the Detroit gossips. The Newberrys stand at the top of the local social heap. Their home is headquarters of all that is conventionally en règle in the rarefied atmosphere of the Michigander four hundred. Mrs. Newberry, regarded as a social figure, is the envy of many another woman, among them the wife of the publisher of a Detroit newspaper of the yellow breed. This lady, having a rich and generous husband, with many pearls and diamonds, Paris clothes, and other accessories, could see no reason why her place should not be equal to that of Mrs. Newberry. Her husband, so the story goes, was sympathetic. Politics rather less than social rivalry entered into the matter. The batteries of a disappointed social ambition were leveled at Newberry as a means of destroying his prestige as head of the creamy element in the Michigander élite. There you have the inside of it. It was a woman's fight.

Editorial Notes.

Among the minor events of the week is the gift by Miss Maude Adams of a fine property on Long Island to the Roman Catholic Sisterhood of "Our Lady of the Cenacle." A New York dispatch states that many are surprised at this gift in view of the fact that Miss Adams is a Protestant. Surely the time has gone by when anybody should regard a gift in the cause of charity as subject to any sectarian obligation. The sisterhood which is to receive the Long Island estate will use the gift to humane ends and it should not concern anybody, as obviously it does not concern the donor, that those who are to administer it should be representative of one faith or another. It is easy to believe that Miss Adams in making a charitable gift—one calling for continuous administration—should choose to place it in the hands of an organization which is continuous and exempt from personality. The Catholic Church goes on from generation to generation; it is not subject to the administrative vicissitudes that so often make havoc of generous purposes.

Some years ago Mrs. Leland Stanford, a Protestant, gave her old home in Sacramento, under dedication for a charitable purpose, into the custody of the Catholic Church. Her reasoning was to this effect: "So given it will be free from taxation under our state laws, and further, be subject to a continuous administration." Protestant organizations are relatively temporary, and are only more or less definitely responsible. They come and go, and too often trusts placed in their hands are lost in the transition from one order or board to another. No such hazard is involved when a trust is placed in the hands of the Catholic Church. So placed, a property or a fund is as nearly assured as anything can be of permanent and discreet administration. No other agency is so definitely capable of administering a beneficent trust, since no other is so removed from liability to alteration of policies, to changes of management and incidental—we almost said inevitable—charges, wastes, and losses.

In another column reference is made to the fall of Briand and incidentally to the habit of the French to upset their administrative organization at frequent intervals and upon trivial considerations. In the same paragraph reference is made to the habit of the English to sustain the government even while subjecting it to unmeasured censure. The experience of an American gentleman in England some few years ago emphasizes the point. Dining at the home of a very famous British statesman, a former cabinet minister, he heard an exhortation of Lloyd George and his associates in the government to which our American habit of free speech in relation to men in office affords no parallel. There were present some half-dozen men, of whom three were of high conventional and political rank. All three at one time or another had been members of the cabinet. Lloyd George was scored as a "scoundrel," as an "upstart," as a "trickster," as an "ambitious schemer," with a hundred other terms of violent reproach. The American visitor found the hardihood to put to his host a question. "Your strictures surprise me; I thought you were a supporter of Lloyd George in the recent election?" "So I was," replied the gentleman addressed; "I supported the 'damned scoundrel' because he is at the head of our affairs and so entitled to support as the man in responsible dealing both with our enemies and our friends. There was, too, in the course of myself and others who despise the man the idea expressed by your great Lincoln in his famous phrase attesting the hazard of 'swapping horses when crossing a stream.' I supported Lloyd George, not because I approve of or respect the man, but under the requirements of a crisis." Here we have a hint of why the British government is a continuing and stable institution. English loyalty to the government is a thing apart from admiration or even respect for its immediate administrative agents. In France there is no such sentiment as that which sustained Lloyd George even at a time when many—perhaps the majority—of his countrymen regarded him lightly or even with an enmity smacking of malice.

The death of Penrose leaves vacant the chairmanship of the Senate Finance Committee. With the possible exception of the chairmanship of the Committee on Foreign Relations, this is the most important of all senatorial posts. Pretty much everything that is largely vital in domestic legislation comes first or last to the bar of the Finance Committee. In legislation, as in most other things, the power of the purse is a dominating force. No chairman of the Finance Committee has ever come from west of the Ohio Valley. In the last half-century Sherman of Ohio, Gorman of Maryland, Morrill of Vermont, Aldrich of Rhode Island, Simmons of North Carolina, and Penrose of Pennsylvania have held that office. Now there is to be a change and in all likelihood the chairmanship of the great Finance Committee will go to McCumber of North Dakota, who is entitled to it under the rule of seniority, but who is without training or other qualification for it. However, this rule does not absolutely control, and McCumber may be passed over for Smoot of Utah, Curtis of Kansas, or Watson of Indiana. The man best equipped for the work is Smoot, and beyond a doubt the Senate as a body would prefer him as against McCumber if the trick can be turned without offense to the latter.

A few months ago Pennsylvania had in the late Senator Penrose and the late Senator Knox, two of the essentially strong men in the senatorial body. Knox was succeeded by William E. Crow, who fell ill almost immediately following his appointment and has now for many weeks been in retirement at Atlantic City. That he will ever again appear in the Senate is extremely doubtful. The appointment of George Wharton Pepper as successor to Penrose will go far to sustain the prestige of Pennsylvania. Pepper is a lawyer in the first rank at the Philadelphia bar. He became known to the country at large last year in connection with the protest against the league of nations proposal. To that discussion he contributed a legal article of notable ability.

It is to the credit of Governor Sproul of Pennsylvania that he declined suggestions presented to him temptingly to secure personal advancement by resigning upon the basis of arrangement with his successor to appoint him (Sproul) to the vacancy caused by the death of Senator Penrose. Tricks of this kind are not uncommon, but inevitably they put upon those who practice them the stamp of individual cheapness. No man of personal dignity and of high self-respect permits himself thus to traffic in the opportunities afforded by official authority.

Senator Penrose gave to the world the impression of a masterful and self-sustained personality. No man ever more definitely lived by the classic rule which forbids explanation, apology, or regret. Whatever his inside emotions were, unless they related to what he had himself in hand, he kept them to himself. Rivals might assail and critics might rail, but they made no outward dent in Penrose's armor of indifference. Penrose never married. He took no part in the social life of Washington. He avoided women and was never seen in companies in which there was a feminine element. What shattered romance of youth lay behind his bachelorhood no one has ever told.

There was a phase of Penrose's character that only his intimates ever discovered. It is told that when he and a party of senators went to Panama on a government cruiser some years ago Penrose was the most playful of the group. Under his chairmanship the party organized itself into a band of imaginary boys playing "make-believe." They became a pirate band with Penrose, satirizing the popular picture of himself, as the pirate chief. They tied up their heads in red badannas and quarreled over imaginary "loot." They made the captain "walk the plank" and during the whole voyage kept the ship in an uproar, always with Penrose the leading spirit and inventing a new stunt for each day.

Another curious aspect of Penrose is illustrated in his strange intimacy with Senator La Follette soon after that tempestuous gentleman came to the Senate. They were much together, hardly on a basis of social equality, but under a species of condescension on the part of Penrose. When La Follette would expound his socialistic theories, quoting Karl Marx in proof, Penrose would retort with further quotations from Marx's later writing, citing chapter and page, in refutation. La Follette found that Penrose was more deeply read in the literature of radicalism than himself. To hear Penrose in the privacy of a stag dinner party deliver a burlesque radical speech was both a literary and a political treat.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

Senator Smoot.

ALTA CLUB
SALT LAKE CITY, January 14, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: In the course of an editorial appraisal of Senator Smoot, in which I heartily concur, you take occasion to say: "He had, or was reported to have, three wives—and the fact, if it was a fact, told strongly against him in his earlier career."

I am neither of Senator Smoot's religious faith nor a beneficiary of nor applicant for his favor. I have known him and his family intimately for thirty years, however, and am conversant with the testimony given during the time his seat in the Senate was under consideration. No charge was made of polygamy against him, and the "protestants" particularly disavowed any such charge. He was opposed as representing a church that had practiced and still countenanced polygamy, and on the further ground that he would follow the mandates of the church rather than his oath of office, should they conflict. No charge that he had practiced polygamy was laid at his door. The people of the United States have every reason to feel happy that the verdict was in his favor and that we enjoy his leadership in the Senate today. GLEN MILLER.

It is said that Anatole France proposes to hand over the entire amount of the Nobel Prize in Literature, which is of the value of 300,000 francs, for the benefit of the sufferers in the Russian famine. The Prize for Chemistry has been awarded to Professor Walter Nernst of Berlin. The following is a list of the authors awarded the Prize in Literature since it was instituted in 1901 in Stockholm by the legacy of Dr. Alfred Nobel: R. F. A. Sully Prudhomme, Theodor Mommsen, Björnsterne Björnson, Frederi Mistral and José Echegaray, Henryk Sienkiewicz, Giosuè Carducci, Rudyard Kipling, Rudolph Eucken, Selma Lagerlöf, Paul Heyse, Maurice Maeterlinck, Gerhart Hauptmann, Rabindranath Tagore, Romain Rolland, Werner von Heidenstam, Karl Gjellerup and Henrik Pontopidan, Carl Spitteler, Knut Hamsun, Anatole France.

The German device, "Deutschland über Alles," is far from being of modern origin, in sentiment at least. So long ago as the fifteenth century, the kaiser-king Friedrich III, called "The Indolent," adopted the five vowels for the imperial device, which read: "Austria Est Imperare Orbi Universo," or "Alles Erdreich Ist Oesterreich Unterthan." In English this modest motto means "Austria's empire is over all universal."

THE YOUNG IRISH.

Biologists used to claim that a child, in growing from inception to maturity, passed through all the stages in human history from protoplasm to prohibition. These ingenious gentlemen have a way of reversing themselves from year to year, but if the above idea still holds, it may be intelligible to say that the average Irishman dies at a point about four-fifths of the way through Mr. Wells' "Outline of History." Scientifically speaking, the Irish reach maturity with Paoli and the Corsican rebellion, and spend their early manhood somewhere in the fifteenth century.

In other words, when we call a young Irishman civilized, it is from politeness or friendship. We know that he is not civilized in our rarefied sense of that word. His impulses belong to a time when individual freedom was rated above law and when a certain illegality was the mark of every man of spirit. Only in his later years does the Irishman dwindle into a kind of acquiescence in the modern theory of the state and begin to reason that perhaps, after all, something can be said for peace and compromise. At this stage, like Bernard Shaw, he is apt to interest himself in such quiet and gentle arts as pugilism and other pursuits in which the shedding of blood is a minor objective.

If you think that this has no important bearing on the Irish Republic you are mistaken, to put it in an Irish way. The Sinn Fein movement is essentially a young man's affair. There are some oldsters in it, like Griffiths, but they rank as counselors, rather than leaders. The typical exemplar of the Sinn Fein spirit is Michael Collins, who was born in 1890. The spirit he expresses is something assertive, headlong, self-sufficient, ruthless, quixotically generous and selfish, all in one—in short: young. Youth characterizes every gesture of the Irish republicans. It appears magnificently in the title of the party, for Sinn Fein being interpreted means "Ourselves Alone"—obviously a young man's motto, and one that belongs to the springtime of history. But from the first the Sinn Fein movement has been opposed by the older Irish people, who have endeavored, with indifferent success, to stay their impetuous sons with the counsels of moderation. It is probably safe to say, if anything can be safely said about Ireland, that the bulk of the older Irishmen still entertain the Redmond conception of Irish freedom, and that it is they who have swung the balance in favor of ratifying the London treaty.

Some very interesting data on this head has been collected in a book called "The Administration of Ireland, 1920," recently published by E. P. Dutton & Co. The book shows a bias against the Irish republicans, which is to be regretted, as it tends to discredit many statements that are obviously founded on sound evidence. It is a pity, also, that the author should have further compromised his account by signing himself "I. O.," as if he were afraid to stand sponsor for his words. In view of the sporting disregard the Irish republicans have always shown for the security of their own necks in the matter of open publication, it ought to be a point of honor with their critics to indict them openly. To do so in Ireland, of course, is hardly conducive to long life. The number of those who have met disagreeable deaths for publishing or saying things unwelcome to the young republicans is considerable. In this respect even Mick Collins ran a grave danger when he returned to Dublin bearing with him the dubious treaty he had signed—a fact that was pointed out by Lloyd George in the House of Commons as a plea for ratification of the pact and for suspension of criticisms that would make Collins' position more difficult.

In the course of his indictment of the Irish republican movement, I. O. tells a gloomy story of murder and outrage by the Sinn Fein in the latter half of 1920 to prove that the crown police and military suffered severe provocation and showed a most marked restraint and chivalry in the system of reprisals to which they were forced. Torture and dum-dum bullets were among the provocations. The author brings out also a number of contradictions in the republican arguments. The execution of Irish rebels by the crown for major offenses and treason has been made the subject of many appeals by republican propagandists for American sympathy; we are not so familiar with the fact that the Irish republic, in setting itself up as a government, threatened all its opponents in Ireland, whether military or civilian, with death. Not all those who met their demise at the hands of the Sinn Fein party belonged to the British army or the Royal Irish Constabulary. Such acts, of course, constitute terrorism, and they had to be either veiled or denied by the Irish supplicants for American aid before the help could be forthcoming, for it was well enough known that if proved they would create a definite and cold hostility in this country toward the rebellion.

Nor did the example and encouragement of disingenuous Germany go for nothing in determining the tactics of the Irish republican army. When Richard Mulcahy, the chief of staff, was captured by the crown forces in Dublin, in November of 1920, a number of lugubrious documents were found on his person. One contained a detailed plan for spreading typhoid fever germs among the British troops by infecting their milk supply. Another revealed a rather less sinister plan of introducing microbes into sacks of oats intended for the British cavalry mounts in order to give them "glanders." Mulcahy's army would not have been Irish had it not leavened these Germanic devices with a good deal of unwitting comedy. In a court-martial held in Cork in September, 1920, a copy of the official organ of the Irish volunteers was brought to light containing an allusion to the trouble caused among enemy cavalry in 1870 in Lorraine by a French regiment mounted on Arab stallions, and it was proposed that since the mounts of the English cavalry units in Ireland included a number of mares, the neighborhood of stallions might be used to occasion disorder among them. These are the lighter touches; the heavier ones are far less whimsical.

But when I. O. has told his full tale, harsh judgment must be tempered with the recollection that no large group of people as a whole can be held responsible for the outrages or follies of individual offenders in a time of passion and upheaval. The preponderating wish in Ireland just now is for peace and justice, and the better elements in the Sinn Fein are as anxious for the change as any. The older people in Ireland have been the chief sufferers in the feud, because in addition to the ills of civil war they have had to endure the opprobrium cast on their country by irresponsible young fire-eaters, some of them actuated by violence more than patriotism, and all of them imbued with the young Irishman's traditional relish of a "row." Prior to the alleged "sacking" of Ennistymon and Lahinch in September, 1920, the police at Ennistymon received this pathetic letter, which needs no interpretation to Americans and provides a telling commentary on what must have been the attitude of many of the old school toward the excesses of their "youngsters":

"Dear Sir—I am giving you a warning to make your men look out for themselves, for the S. F. is going to make a raid on them some day. Let your men look out and the two officers that is going by themselves in the black motor. They will give them a downfall as sure as you are reading this. They would want to look out for themselves; we can not stop our young innocent sons. Sure the leading man of them all is John O'Loughlin, the man that is going to all the races, why he has plenty of powder and firearms. We would have an easy mind if you would frighten those murderers. They want more blood. . . ."

We did not need to be told this to understand that the Sinn Fein story in the Irish-American press is not the whole story. One of the obstacles encountered by the republicans in stirring up anti-English sentiment in this country was that we understood the Irish character and something of the problem with which England had been confronted. We know that an Irish report of an event is apt to be more vivid than just, and that the young Irishman is never at a loss for a casus belli. Also that when the Irish are out of one series of troubles they will always invent others to add to the general gusto of living. A few days ago I received a letter from a friend who had attended the San Joaquin Citrus Fair in company with a proud son of Erin. One passage in the letter has a symbolical appositeness in this connection that prompts me to invite death by quoting it. The young visitors had added to the interest of the afternoon with a muchkin of the Irish national beverage, and had met up with some kindred souls whose thirst was proof against the citrus extract which was the feature of the fair:

"During the evening we sent to town for Chinese noodles. In trying to eat them, Irish, who had never seen the dish in his native land, spilled some on his vest. The guests thought that funny, and of course Irish objected. He insisted that if he wanted to spill noodles, he'd spill noodles, and no one could stop him. He spilled some more, looked more pugnacious than ever, and again stated emphatically that he'd be damned if any one could keep him out of the noodles. He offered fifty dollars to any one who would try to keep him or anybody who was a friend of his out of the noodles. His offer was eventually increased to twenty thousand dollars, and in a mighty effort to compel some one to keep him out of the Chinese staff of life he finally took his bowl and dumped the contents on his own head."

In other words, when Ireland becomes a republic, who is going to keep her out of the noodles?

The main subject of conjecture about Irish affairs will soon be whether Michael Collins is a real statesman or a popular hero. His romantic career of outlawry has endeared him to the popular imagination, and during the days when he carried the fifty-thousand-dollar bounty on his head his exploits in evading the crown sleuths were in the best vein of Irish drama. One of his bravadoes—when he discussed incognito the possibility of his capture, with one of his pursuers—recalls the main episode in Lady Gregory's "Rising of the Moon." A man who can turn popular drama into fact has no trouble in commanding the hearts of an imaginative people—at least for a time. But hitherto he has done everything under the dictation of Griffiths, and his enemies point out features in his record which are less unquestionably heroic. After leaving home at an early age and living for a while in Cork, he went to London to take employment in the sorting branch of the general postoffice. He left England in March, 1916, driven home, it is claimed, only by the fear of conscription. But one must take all such personal charges with a certain reserve. Collins was closely associated with the Irish exiles in London, drilled with them secretly for the part he was later to play, and in his Irish career thus far has shown the instincts of a patriot, as well as every mark of physical and moral courage.

The question with regard to the whole of the Irish republican movement is how much of it is romance and drama and how much arises from a rational conviction that Ireland really needs separation from the empire. Drama and mystery have been plentiful in the history of the Sinn Féin, and these are qualities that will always appeal to the young, quite independently of reason. The mysteries of Sir Roger Casement and of the means by which Eamon de Valera and the "Invisible Army" were brought to Ireland are of the sort that command an unreasoning popular enthusiasm. (One wonders whether the mysterious vehicle in the latter instances may not have been the submarine, in view of the number of other ruses the Irish have borrowed from Germany.)

And altogether the most interesting query for us is whether an Irish state, left free to intrigue with all the disaffected factions of the Continent, would not be a grave danger to the peace of the world. At present it would almost inevitably involve the United States in war, though the danger would of course decrease as the Irish forgot their traditional grievance in the animosities of self-government, such as those which the handing over of Dublin Castle has already set in motion.

AUBREY BOVD.

SAN FRANCISCO, January 18, 1922.

F. C. Cornell, Fellow of the Royal Geographical Society, who recently returned to England after spending twenty years in practically unknown parts of South Africa, is author of a story about an unknown monster that had been seen near the Great Falls of the Orange River. It has a huge head and a neck ten feet long like a bending tree. It seizes the native cattle and drags them under water. The natives call it "Kyman," or the Great Thing. Last May Mr. Cornell, accompanied by two white companions, W. H. Brown and N. B. Way of Capetown, and three Hottentots, went to the junction of the Oub and Orange rivers to see the monster if possible. He writes: "At the cries of the natives I saw something black, huge, and sinuous swimming rapidly against the current in the swirling rapids. The monster kept its enormous body under water, but the neck was plainly visible. The monster may have been a very gigantic python, but if it was it was of an incredible size. This reptile may have lived for hundreds of years. Pythons approaching it in size have been said to have lived that long."

Dr. A. H. Macklin, surgeon and biologist on board Sir Ernest Shackleton's ship, the Quest, has sent home an interesting letter about the voyage, which he describes as no picnic, but an arduous trip (says the Manchester Guardian). The Quest, he says, is not a very comfortable vessel. "At all times a lively ship, she has spent most of her time putting both gunwales under, but she is a fine tight little ship and will stand anything." On leaving Lisbon the ship encountered head winds and a nasty sea, and Dr. Macklin suffered all the agonies of extreme seasickness. It was all he could do, he says, to stick it out, and his spells at the wheel were simply a misery. Though a good sea ship, the Quest provided too much perpetual roll and pitch. Sir Ernest Shackleton, says the doctor, is in good form and becomes younger-looking every day. "The trip, so far, can be summed up thus: Bad weather, much rolling and pitching; ship routine and seasickness."

Leonardo da Vinci's conviction that submarines should not be used because of the impossibility of using them properly gains emphasis from the fact that he invented a "sub." His opinion after five hundred years still has timeliness. We read in Dr. J. P. Richter's "The Literary Works of Leonardo da Vinci," Paragraph I: "How by a certain machine many may stay some time under water. And how and wherefore I do not describe my method of remaining under water. . . . And I do not publish nor divulge these, by reason of the evil nature of men, who would use them for assassinations at the bottom of the sea by destroying ships and sinking them, together with the men in them."

Insurance as a distinct business originated, according to a lecture delivered before the Insurance Institute of London, at Lloyd's coffee-house, which was first heard of in 1688, as a house specially patronized by shipping men. A little sheet called Lloyd's News was first published in 1696, which only ran for six months, but which plainly showed the clientele of the coffee-house. A great feature of Lloyd's was shipping intelligence, and this ultimately developed in 1726 into the founding of Lloyd's List, which with the exception of the London Gazette is the oldest existing newspaper in the world.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Miss Mary Texan Loomis of Washington, D. C., is said to be the only woman in the world to own and conduct a radio school.

Miss Agnes McPhail of Ceylon, Ontario, is Canada's first woman M. P. Miss McPhail, who is thirty-one years old, was elected on the Progressive ticket.

Augustine Massa, checker champion of Columbia University, who, though totally blind, is planning to test his skill by meeting twenty opponents simultaneously—a stunt that requires the memorizing of 480 checker positions at one time.

Miss Mary McCormic, who was a "cowgirl" only a year ago, working on her father's ranch in the West, is now singing one of the leading rôles in "Carmen" with the Chicago Grand Opera Company. Miss McCormic was discovered by Mary Garden.

Princess Troubetskoy, who escaped to London when the Bolsheviks were hunting down the Russian aristocracy, has been given the job of decorating Saint Philip's Church, which has been given over by the British government for the use of the large London colony of Russian refugees.

At the convention of the Investment Bankers' Association, held recently in New Orleans, Mr. Howard F. Beebe was elected president. Mr. Beebe, who is one of the younger investment bankers, is with Harris Forbes & Co. of New York. He has for several years been active in the management of the Investment Bankers' Association.

Harold Shapley, just elected astronomer at the Harvard College Observatory to succeed its long-time astronomer, Edward C. Pickering, who died before his great life work was finished, is only thirty-five years of age. He made his world-wide reputation in the Wilson Observatory, California, in what may be called space-sounding, a process accomplished by the super-science, celestial spectrum photography.

Sir John Kirk, who was chief officer on David Livingstone's government expedition to Africa in 1858, has died at the age of ninety. Sir John has been a member of the government committee for construction of the Uganda Railway since 1895. He served in Turkey during the Russian war, has been consul-general to Zanzibar, and was British plenipotentiary at Brussels to the African conference, 1889-90.

The premier-elect of Canada, Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, is decidedly a scholar in politics. His "Industry and Humanity," published a few years ago, shows Mr. King as a thinker of unusual clarity and a man of great breadth of vision. The premier-elect has made labor problems his life-long interest. He was editor of the Labor Gazette and minister of labor in the Laurier administration. He has acted as conciliator in many important strikes. When he took over the leadership of the Liberal party in Canada ten years ago it was almost in extremis. Under his care it has become the strongest political party in the Dominion.

Lord Beaverbrook, the head of the British department of propaganda during the war and one of the greatest newspaper and periodical directors in the world, is publishing the story of his success. As he was born the son of a Presbyterian clergyman in the rural districts of New Brunswick, his life may well be termed romantically successful. Lord Beaverbrook was created a knight in 1911 and baron in 1916. He was with the Canadian Expeditionary Forces in 1915 as eyewitness and represented the government of Canada at the front in 1916. In 1917 he was made officer in charge of the Canadian war records, and in 1918 chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and minister of information. He is the author of "Canada in Flanders."

Lord Riddell, who has recently declared our nation on the way to be one of the most courteous in the world, was from one point of view the greatest man at the Conference. He has been the mold of public opinion. George Allardice Riddell, first Baron Riddell, is one of the greatest newspaper proprietors in the world. He is director of the News of the World, a London weekly with a circulation of 2,500,000, or, as one writer designates it, a trashy paper that all London reads. Lord Riddell is also responsible for the Western Mail, Country Life, and several other publications. Among various other honors he has been made an officer of the French Legion of Honor, and as all the world knows represented the British press at the Peace Conference 1919-20. He is fifty-seven years old, is married, and is a devotee of the royal and ancient game.

Alexander Teixeira de Mattos died suddenly on December 5th at St. Ives, England. Mr. Teixeira was undoubtedly the most distinguished translator of foreign languages of the present generation, and it was his untiring energy and skill, which amounted almost to genius, in translating the thought of foreigners into beautiful English that has given to the English-speaking world the classic translations of Maurice Maeterlinck, J. Henri Fabre, the distinguished French naturalist, and Louis Couperus, the Dutch novelist. Teixeira translated books and plays with equal facility from French, Flemish, German, Danish, and Dutch. He was a well-known figure in London and had many warm friends among the literary set there, including Stephen McKenna, Bernard Miall, Alfred Sutro, and E. Phillips Oppenheim. His genial personality endeared him to many. As a translator of foreign languages he is almost irreplaceable.

Dream-Pedlary.

If there were dreams to sell,
What would you buy?
Some cost a passing bell;
Some a light sigh,
That shakes from Life's fresh crown
Only a rose-leaf down.
If there were dreams to sell,
Merry and sad to tell,
And the crier rang the bell,
What would you buy?

A cottage lone and still,
With bowers nigh,
Shadowy, my woes to still,
Until I die.
Such pearl from Life's fresh crown
Fain would I shake me down.
Were dreams to have at will,
This would best heal my ill,
This would I buy.

Heather Ale.

From the bonny bells of heather
They brewed a drink long-syne,
Was sweeter far than honey,
Was stronger far than wine.
They brewed it and they drank it,
And lay in a blessed swoon
For days and days together
In their dwellings underground.

There rose a king in Scotland,
A fell man to his foes,
He smote the Picts in battle,
He hunted them like roes.
Over miles of the red mountain
He hunted as they fled,
And strewed the dwarfish bodies
Of the dying and the dead.

Summer came in the country,
Red was the heather-bell;
But the manner of the brewing
Was none alive to tell.
In graves that were like children's,
On many a mountain head,
The Brewsters of the Heather
Lay numbered with the dead.

The king in the red moorland
Rode on a summer's day;
And the bees hummed, and the curlews
Cried beside the way.
The king rode, and was angry,
Black was his brow and pale,
To rule in a land of heather
And lack the Heather Ale.

It fortune'd that his vassals,
Riding free on the heath,
Came on a stone that was fallen
And vermin hid beneath.
Rudely plucked from their hiding,
Never a word they spoke:
A son and his aged father—
Last of the dwarfish folk.

The king sat high on his charger,
He looked on the little men;
And the dwarfish and swarthy couple
Looked at the king again.
Down by the shore he had them;
And there on the giddy brink—
"I will give you life, ye vermin,
For the secret of the drink."

There stood the son and father
And they looked high and low;
The heather was red around them,
The sea rumbled below.
And up and spoke the father,
Shrill was his voice to hear:
"I have a word in private,
A word for the royal ear.

"Life is dear to the aged,
And honour a little thing;
I would gladly sell the secret,"
Quoth the Pict to the king.
His voice was small as a sparrow's,
And shrill and wonderful clear;
"I would gladly sell my secret,
Only my son I fear.

"For life is a little matter
And death is nought to the young;
And I dare not sell my honour
Under the eye of my son.
Take him, O king, and bind him,
And cast him far in the deep;
And it's I will tell the secret
That I have sworn to keep."

They took the son and bound him,
Neck and heels in a thong,
And a lad took him and swung him,
And flung him far and strong,
And the sea swallowed his body,
Like that of a child of ten;—
And there on the cliff stood the father,
Last of the dwarfish men.

"True was the word I told you:
Only my son I feared;
For I doubt the sapling courage
That goes without the beard.
But now in vain is the torture,
Fire shall never avail:
Here dies in my bosom
The secret of Heather Ale."

The proverb, "There's many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip," is very ancient—some scholars attributing it to Homer, others to Pallas.

THE IMPLACABLE MR. GOMPERS.

A Disclosure of the American Labor Leader's Belief in the Futility of Discussion.

The silence of Mr. Samuel Gompers on the issues at present racking the labor parties of Europe is in striking contrast with the articulateness both of capital and labor abroad, and of big business in America. The truth seems to be that Mr. Gompers has less concern with the fate of humanity than with the local interests of the four brotherhoods. This narrowness of vision may be more seeming than real. It may be that he is capable of leading American labor to a higher destiny than that of mere battenning on the spoils appropriated by our barons of finance. But if so, his present attitude is extremely misleading.

A few days ago he declared himself opposed to the projected economic conference at Genoa, on the ground that a conference on economic relations in America was of much more importance. A statement of this kind from a professed friend of democracy is hard to understand. One could follow Mr. Gompers more readily were he to ground his objections to the Genoa conference in the assertion that it will in no way express the aspirations of the common people of the world, and that, as Hillaire Belloc has contended, the share of the people in such negotiations is as illusory, under present conditions, as the idea of representative government in a state ruled by capital. Whether or not one agreed with this reasoning, it would at least be intelligible. And one would then expect Mr. Gompers to make himself very explicit and clear about universal brotherhood, and the need of representing all phases of the world's industry in the Genoa discussion.

But Mr. Gompers is evidently too opportune and discreet a wind-trimmer to be betrayed into any such Utopian ardors at the present time, or to provide the American worker at any time with what might be called "moral" leadership. He has as little concern with questions of international freedom and amity as had any of the raiding barons of feudalism he so closely resembles. His code is as materialistic as that of the ranks he opposes. To a dispassionate eye, he seems a mere leader of the camp followers of capitalism, rating profit above principle, and caring nothing about the origin of the plunder, so long as his cohorts receive their share of it. One does not gather this so much from what he says (for the words liberty and humanity pan heavily in his public addresses) as from what he omits to say in justification of some of the anomalies of his position. It is to be remembered that Mr. Gompers' organization sent no representative to the International Labor Conference at Geneva, and that many of his followers have opposed the recent effort at Washington to institute a ten-year naval holiday on the plea that it would "reduce employment."

His attitude toward the larger relations between capital and labor can be inferred from the terms in which he disputed with Governor Henry G. Allen of Kansas, last year, the value of the Kansas Court of Industrial Relations, a body recently formed to adjudicate disputes between workmen and employers in that state. The debate was held in Carnegie Hall, New York, before an audience drawn largely from the lower and middle classes, and it afforded Gompers an ideal opportunity of revealing whatever vision he possessed. The discussion has been recorded in detail by Elmer T. Peterson, co-author with Governor Allen of a recent volume, "The Party of the Third Part," which explains the purpose of the court in question and its relation to the interests of the public as well as the special interests of labor and capital:

When I reached Carnegie Hall it was time for the debate to begin, and there was a great crowd outside, in spite of the fact that the newspapers had announced that there would be no admission except by free tickets allotted in advance. A squad of bluecoats held the people in check, and directed those who were to be admitted.

At the last moment the garment makers' union, two or three hundred strong, asked for the privilege of standing in the aisles, and this permission was granted. Those who have seen the garment makers congregate at the intersections of lower Fifth Avenue know how they love an argument.

I sat near one of them during the debate and talked with him at the close. He had enthusiastically applauded Mr. Gompers throughout the discussion, but he wore a thoughtful air and conceded that it was a fair presentation all around.

There was sober and respectful attention, and then applause, from all parts of the hall, when Governor Allen graphically and eloquently pictured the beginnings and the progress of brotherhood, how it began with Calvary and continued through the centuries to the deeds of Paul and Savoranola and Cromwell and the Pilgrims and Washington's soldiers and Lincoln.

Governor Allen then spoke of America's possible future leadership in that progress, and stated it to be conditional on the establishment in America of righteous and responsible government as a peaceful arbiter in the disputes between capital and labor and other interests now opposing each other. Mr. Peterson continues the interpretation:

It seemed to me that the attitude of the organized-labor contingent was that Governor Allen's argument appealed to their heads and Mr. Gompers' appealed to whatever of deep-seated prejudices they had. They attended the debate without any intention of being convinced of the wisdom of the new plan, but their mental defenses were overcome in unexpected places. Their loyalty to Mr. Gompers personally was unshaken, but their close attention showed that they were there in a spirit of inquiry.

The personal loyalty shown Mr. Gompers was attested by hurricanes of applause and floral tributes. Such cries as, "Keep it up, Sam," greeted him as he made especially vigorous drives.

As the debate proceeded, it proved illuminative of the attitude of the leader of American labor toward the principle of coöperative government:

The audience sat respectfully and expectantly through Mr. Gompers' opening speech. It applauded the recital of labor's honorable triumphs. It liked to hear of the abolition of child labor and the winning of humanitarian conditions.

"The free man's ownership of himself and his labor implies that he may sell it to another or withhold it," said the veteran labor chief. Certainly—the crowd agreed with that. The audience believed that a man may work even if others do not want him to work, or he may quit even if others do not want him to quit.

"Capital is that which one has—labor is that which one is," he said, and the people cheered the aphorism. He recited the history of labor and its winning fight for reforms and betterments. He bitterly arraigned what he said was a proposal to make it a crime to quit work. It was against the Thirteenth Amendment, he said. He pleaded eloquently for individual liberty.

"The free man's ownership of himself and his labor implies that he may sell it to another or withhold it; that he may, with others similarly situated, sell their labor power or withhold it; that no man has even an implied property right in the labor of another; that free men may sell their labor under the stress of their needs, or they may withhold it to obtain more advantageous returns. Any legislation or court construction dealing with the subject of organizations, corporations, or trusts which curtail or corner the products of labor can have no true application to the association of free men in the disposition or withholding of their labor power.

"The attempt to deny free men, by any process, the right of association, the right to withhold their labor power or to induce others to withhold their labor power, whether these men be engaged in an industrial dispute with their employers, or whether they be other workmen who have taken the places of those engaged in the original dispute, is an invasion of man's ownership of himself and of his labor power, and is a claim of some form of property right in the workmen who have taken the places of strikers, or men locked out."

"Liberty! What is liberty? The right to own oneself, that he may do with his powers what best conserves his interests and his welfare.

The only difficulty in Mr. Gompers' contention was, of course, that in a democratic state no individual can exert a privilege that endangers the rights of other citizens. Compromise between individual liberty and the freedom of society as a whole is the basis of all orderly government. Had Mr. Gompers objected to the legislative and judicial branches of American government as being representative; not of the common will, but of the purposes of a special class, he would have come nearer the centre of the greatest problem now facing democracy. But one will always look in vain to Mr. Gompers for any constructive suggestion as to a means of avoiding war within nations or among them:

When he finished he was greeted with an ovation, and was presented with a huge bouquet of flowers. With a surprisingly strong voice and vigorous presentation the labor chief had sounded the familiar tocsins and alarms of the unions. The labor leaders greeted him almost with reverence.

It was an interesting psychological study. Mr. Gompers was not talking to the American public. He was scarcely talking to the people in the hall, except as he knew them to be intermediaries and carriers of his message.

He was talking to his own followers, and he was saying the things he knew they would like to have him say. He was the old champion, interposing his gallant "stub of a sword," as he himself put it, between the old way and the new, and he sought to preserve the old way—the only hope of the primitive rough-and-tumble unionism—the right to strike.

As he stalked sturdily to his seat he looked impassively truculent and quite sure of his appeal. His personality, his gray hair, and his picturesquely rugged face made a deep impression. If his opponent had been a spokesman for capital he would have had to start an uphill climb.

But the man who arose to take up the argument was a man who was an actual handworker, without resources, struggling through college, at a time long after Mr. Gompers had forsaken the shop for the office. Governor Allen was not speaking for the party of the first part or the party of the second part, but for the party of the third part. It was the public he represented, and the arguments he used were not the stock arguments of capital, but the new plea for the unorganized majority and for the laborer in the ranks.

Graphically and rapidly he sketched the events of the Kansas coal strike. He told of the impending suffering from cold in midwinter. He told of the stubborn union boss, Howat, who bowed his neck against all humanitarian efforts to bridge over the fuel famine. He told of the state receiver-ships and the call for volunteers. He told of the young soldiers who led the movement. He told of the boycotting of the Pittsburg hospital by the unions, and the threat of death by freezing, to the inmates. He told of the poor washerwoman who was threatened with disaster because she washed clothes for the volunteers. And then he told of Guffey, the union miner who determined to work in spite of the union boss' orders, to save his family from starvation, and how the union therefore suspended him for ninety-nine years and made grievous threats against him. "There's your personal liberty," he said, in a sudden climax, hurling the favorite union phrase back at Mr. Gompers.

One could almost imagine the union leaders' surprised "Ugh!" as this blow struck home. There was an instant of shocked silence, and then a chorus of "boos" and hisses.

As soon as it was seen that Mr. Gompers would have to abandon his somewhat detached attitude and recognize his adversary in a personal way, the hearers became more turbulent and keenly interested. Applause arose in spontaneous waves at each telling point.

Governor Allen developed his theme to a climax, bringing in the arguments as they appear in this book.

"We have not taken from labor the right to quit work," he said, in another flash of sarcasm. "We have only taken away from the labor leader his divine right to order men to quit work."

There was another chorus of "boos" and hisses from those who were hit. There were wild cheers from his supporters. The speaker smiled amiably and waited.

"Now, we will just take that as an expression from both sides. I know just how you feel. If you permit me, I will go on."

With two or three minutes to spare, at the end of his first speech, he went over to a table, hunted around a bit, and came back to the front of the stage with a sheet of paper.

"I would like most respectfully to ask President Gompers if he will answer a question," he said.

The audience pricked up its ears. He read, slowly and distinctly:

"When a dispute between capital and labor brings on a strike affecting the production or distribution of the necessities of life, thus threatening the public peace and impairing the public health, has the public any rights in such a controversy, or is it a private war between capital and labor?" If you answer this question in the affirmative, Mr. Gompers, how would you protect the rights of the public?

"And, in addition, I wish him to define, if he will, who had the divine right to forbid the switchmen to strike in their out-law strike? Who controls this divine right to quit work?"

He sat down, and the audience went into a long and exuberant wave of applause. Things were getting highly interesting. What would Gompers say? How would he answer those questions? Everybody craned his neck as the stocky little man in the long frock coat arose stiffly for his second speech.

He paced back and forth. Visibly irritated and uneasy, he seemed to feel that the solid ground had slipped from under him.

"It is one of the most difficult tasks for one to attempt to keep up with a statement of facts or alleged facts and expect another to answer," he began. "The governor has taken up the last minute of his time to read a question. If I had time I would answer the governor."

"Answer it, answer it," urged several voices, encouragingly, from the audience. There was a confusion of cries, intermingled with laughter and cheers. The speaker became nettled.

"I will prove it to you," he shouted, warming up, "if I live long enough to prove to you, that I can! Let me say this, however, that an innocent child can ask more questions of his father—"

"Answer it, answer it," persisted the voices from the gallery. It was a new situation. The veteran labor leader seemed to feel hurt.

"The governor's adherents here are made up of ladies and gentlemen," he said, with implied reproof. "I shall try to answer the governor's statements as best I can, and I assure you of an answer if I have the time, even this evening."

Governor Allen's supporters in the audience exchanged knowing looks, and Mr. Gompers proceeded to discuss some other phase of the labor question.

Mr. Gompers did not answer the question that night. He issued a statement ten days later, which purported to be an answer. But in actuality he has not replied to the question up to the time this was written, late in November, 1920. His statement was a halting evasion. He will not reply unless he is prepared to relinquish his leadership.

Why?

Because a clear-cut affirmative answer, together with some plan for protecting the public, will offend the radicals, who do not concede that there are any rights except those of the so-called proletariat, no matter what the proletariat desires. A negative answer would, of course, serve to alienate every believer in the American form of government, and render outlaw Mr. Gompers' whole sphere of influence.

Governor Allen answered the question simply by citing the American Constitution, which makes the rights of the public paramount to every special interest.

Why did Mr. Gompers stumble at this question?

The reason was obvious enough, and was accurately interpreted by Mr. Peterson when he called it "an unwillingness to acknowledge the sovereignty of the unorganized majority, and an assumption of special privilege by an organized minority," in other words precisely the tendency for which Mr. Gompers has so often and so justly arraigned American capital. But to what purpose, if a precisely corresponding wrong is to be added to the original one? In conclusion the author reveals Mr. Gompers at one of his top moments as a protagonist of class war:

When his hecklers in the audience for the third time pressed him to reply, saying, "Why don't you answer it?" he lost his temper, and blazed forth, "Why don't you shut up?"

He did not answer the other question, either. Withdrawing from the uncomfortable atmosphere of such controversial matters, at the last he betook himself to the shelter of his first attitude—that of the heroic champion of labor. There was something akin to pathos about it.

He was again appealing to his followers for their personal admiration. He finished the debate suggestively, as I shall finish this story of it, by the use of a poem. He used it for reasons that are sufficient to himself. It may help to explain his attitude toward the debate and throw some light on the psychology of Carnegie Hall that evening. Here is the poem:

More than half beaten, but fearless,
Facing the storm and the night,
Reckless and reeling, but fearless,
Here in the fire of the fight
I who bow not but before thee,
God of the fighting clan,
Lifting my fists I implore thee
Give me the heart of a man.

What though I live with the winners,
Or perish with those who fall,
Only the cowards are sinners,
Fighting the fight is all.

Strong is my foe, he advances,
Snapped is my blade, O Lord,
See the proud banners and lances,
Oh, spare me this stub of a sword.

Give me no pity nor spare me,
Calm not the wrath of my foe,
See where he beckons to dare me;
Bleeding, half beaten, I go.

Not for the glory of winning,
Not for the fear of the night,
Shunning the battle is sinning,
Oh, spare me the heart to fight.

Red is the mist about me,
Deep is the wound in my side,
Coward, thou criest to flout me,
Oh, terrible foe, thou hast lied.

Here with the battle before me,
God of the fighting clan,
Grant that the woman who bore me
Suffered to suckle a man.

Governor Allen's book contains an interesting exposition of one of the few attempts that have been made to find a constructive solution to the greatest of modern problems. If the workers mistrust it as consigning their fate to a government that has not proved itself representative of the public will, there are many remedies which will prove at least less baleful for all concerned than the "direct action" toward which American labor seems at present to be tending.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending January 14, 1922, were $153,000,000, for the corresponding week of last year, $149,200,000; a gain of $3,800,000.

Few people understand the structure of some of our leading railway systems. The layman can readily visualize the blazing of the U. P. trail across the prairies and over the Rockies. He remembers the picture of the driving of the last spike that cemented the Atlantic and Pacific by rail; and the business man understands the bonding and mortgaging of various portions of the main line in order to finance the construction. But many of our Eastern trunk lines were not built in this way. They were not started at one main

When the smaller railroad companies were operating under their own management, they were profitable concerns to their stockholders. It was the inducement of a higher rate of interest and a guarantee of that rate by a strong company that induced the stockholders to draw up a lease, agreeing to have a larger company operate them for a fixed rental on their property. And the earnings of the leased lines under the management of the stronger companies have in many cases jumped to remarkably high figures and are very profitable propositions to the guarantors, so much so that in many cases the independent earnings will not be revealed by the major company, and they only show in their reports all the earnings of the leased properties pooled together.

The strategic and favorable position of the individual roads which are leased by parent companies add greatly to their importance and intrinsic value. For instance, the entrance to New York of the New York Central System (used also by the N. Y., N. H. & H. R. R.) is owned for several miles by the New York & Harlem R. R. Co., which also owns the heart of the Grand Central Terminal. The United New Jersey R. R. & Canal Co. has the unique position of owning the entrance of the Pennsylvania Railroad System to New York Harbor and of owning the terminals in Jersey City now used by the Pennsylvania. Likewise the Morris & Essex Railroad controls the entrance of the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western to New York harbor. Without these properties the main trunk lines would be in an awkward position in that they would not reach the port of New York. Omission of the rental for the property, which is in the form of dividends to the stockholders, would automatically break the leases of these various lines, and the stockholders could prevent the parent company from using their property.

The guaranteed dividends are therefore, in effect, a fixed charge of the railroad. They must be paid after the operating expenses and come in the same category with the interest on money borrowed by the railroad on bonds. Consequently these dividends are paid before any dividends on the common or preferred stocks of the companies themselves, which depend on earnings and may be reduced or discontinued by the board of directors. In other words, the position of these dividends is extremely strong, somewhat similar to the interest on equipment bonds, as in one case the interest is paid for the use of railroad equipment and in the other case the dividends are paid for the use of the property itself. In this respect guaranteed stocks might be regarded the same as real estate mortgages.

In judging the worth and merit of guaranteed stocks there are three things which must be examined and considered carefully: First, the property itself; second, its earning power; third, the terms of the lease.

It is important to examine the value of the property by itself and to see if it could realize the amount of its capitalization. The earning power should be judged both from its value to the main system—its guarantor—and from its own independent earning powers. The terms of the lease should be examined, as they vary widely. Some leases are for a fixed rental, other leases are for the interest on the bonds and a percentage of the stock. The latter leases are the strongest, as no matter what taxes might be exacted from the company the rate of percentage is guaranteed on the capital stock after all expenses. Other leases are so drawn that should the earnings of the leased road become large enough to pay the lease many times over, an increase in dividend must be paid. Still other leases read that a certain percentage of the gross earnings will be paid by the guarantor to the leased line.

It is interesting to see how guaranteed stocks have fared in receiverships of their guarantor. Take, for example, the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Company. From 1880 to 1888 this road passed through two receiverships, and during those years the guaranteed stocks paid their dividends right through the receiverships. In 1896 it went into the hands of the receiver for the third time and after the company had defaulted on its general mortgage bonds and had been sold at auction, new leases were executed with five of the minor leased lines slightly reducing the rental. The four main line and strongest guaranteed stocks—the Delaware & Bound Brook, the East Pennsylvania, the Philadelphia, Germantown & Norristown, and the North Pennsylvania, however, were not changed, for rather than accept reduced rentals the owners of these securities would have taken over the operation of their own lines, and they could have done this to their advantage. Thus is shown the strong position of guaranteed stocks which have valuable property of their own with good earning powers and a strong lease.

It is apparent from the above analysis that a well-chosen property guaranteed by a strong parent company is a very advantageous form of investment. This type of security has many attractive features. Being a stock in form, it is exempt from the Federal normal income tax, which increases its yield in many cases over the bond interest rates. The trend of prices of best guaranteed stocks over a twenty-year period varies as the trend of prices on the best first mortgage bonds. In several cases it has crossed the average price of first mortgage bonds, but as a rule follows closely the bond prices. The real factor, of course, in determining the price of guaranteed stocks is the money market, and as their security in many cases is unquestionable, the money market is the only determining factor governing their price. The holder of guaranteed stocks has a permanent investment; he does not have to think of the maturity of his investment as is the case with bonds. His money is invested for a long period and so at times such as these he has the advantage of the high interest rates for the period of the lease (usually 99 or 999 years). He also has his dividend checks mailed to him and does not have to cut coupons.

Here are examples of a few guaranteed railroad stocks: The Pittsburgh, Ft. Wayne & Chicago preferred 7 per cent. stock is guaranteed by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. There is $19,714,286 of this stock outstanding and no funded debt. The road runs from Pittsburgh to Chicago, is double track all the way, and owns its terminals both at Chicago and Pittsburgh, the real estate value of which is greater than the total amount of preferred stock outstanding. The lease runs for 999 years.

The Morris & Essex Company has 7 3/4 per cent. guaranteed by the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western. It has $33,477,000 funded debt and $15,000,000 stock. It controls the entrance to the whole D. L. & W. System to New York Harbor extending from Phillipsburg, New Jersey, to Hoboken and owns its terminals in Jersey City. The original lease provided for a dividend of 7 per cent. guaranteed by the D. L. & W. with a clause to the effect that if 30 per cent. of the gross earnings of the Morris & Essex be sufficient to pay off the bond interest and 10 per cent. on the stock guaranteed, then an extra dividend be paid to the stockholders. This being the case, the stockholders succeeded in raising the guarantee to a fixed rate of 7 3/4 per cent. The lease runs in perpetuity.

It also owns its terminal, many valuable piers in Jersey City, and the twenty million dollars of improvements put on the property by the Pennsylvania. The lease runs for 999 years.

All bonds of the investment class have had an astounding appreciation during the past six months—a rise in price that has been unprecedented within a generation, if not more.

The question that presents itself is: "Have we reached the top of that rise and shall we see lower prices for the next year, or will this rise, remarkable though it be, continue with market recessions to still higher prices?" We terminal and constructed to another. In the language of the automobile industry they are "assembled" roads (says Samuel Sloan Walker in World's Work).

Take, for instance, the Pennsylvania Railroad and the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western. Both these lines are formed by a combination of many shorter and independent systems. When the master minds were conceiving the plan of the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western from New York to Buffalo they leased several already operating railroads, e. g., they leased one from Binghamton to Buffalo and another from Phillipsburg to New York, and by building and obtaining control of the connecting links finally evolved the through system. This company now owns only 30 per cent. of its main line and but 40 per cent. of its entire system.

The original Pennsylvania Railroad ran from Harrisburg to Philadelphia. Many consolidations were then made, and in 1869 one road from Pittsburgh to Chicago was leased and in 1871 two others were leased, extending the railroad from Philadelphia to New York. Thus the main Pennsylvania System from Chicago to New York materialized. A glance at the map will show how the trunk line of the Pennsylvania was extended by this method.

can not determine this question until we form some basis of the factors that caused the rise in bond values. If the forces behind these fundamental factors have been exhausted, we can not expect to see the bond market continue its upward course. If, on the other hand, these forces are still in the making and have power still behind them, the bond market will continue to higher levels.

During the war we could hardly expect anything but a depreciation in bond values in the

The rise in the purchasing power of the dollar also had a stimulating effect on the bond market. Naturally, when a stated income from a bond can purchase more than it could formerly, such value in the purchasing power of the dollar will evidence itself by an appreciation in the price of the bond; not only that, but in that event the very obligation itself is worth more. One need only to turn to Germany and realize how little value a bond has which is payable today in their depreciated currency. It is a paradise for debtors and an inferno for creditors. The former pay next to nothing now for real value which they received some years ago; while the latter receive practically nothing now for what they gave in real value years ago. So we can assume as a basic principle that a rise in the purchasing power of the dollar means a rise in bond prices.

War activities increased the demand for credit enormously, while the supply of money and credit was increased accordingly; but the demand for this huge, unnatural military activity could never be satisfied. What money may have been available for investment purposes was used for government financing.

Investment conditions usually depend upon business conditions. Whenever business is very active, funds for investment are lacking as they are in service for commercial activity. General investment conditions and general business activity rarely go forward hand-in-hand. In fact, people always react from the giddy, dizzy heights of very profitable business with corresponding high prices, to investment buying. Psychologically, people realize that they want to be safe from the shocks of commercial and financial disaster. They see a precipitous fall of prices and the crash of finance and they seek their cyclone cellars. This means a demand for investment securities. The tremendous rise in the bond market we have lately witnessed is ample evidence of that conclusion.

We must also remember that when industries are inflated, prices are inflated; and it takes more money to do business, not only because it is more active, but because prices are higher. So the amount and degree of business activity that we will have next year can be interpreted as a barometer of bond prices. Will business come back to a real active and prosperous basis under existing conditions? These conditions are a lack of balance between producer, manufacturer, and distributor, not only in this country, but abroad. You see agricultural products and other basic and raw materials selling at prices below those existing in pre-war times.

On the other hand, you can observe that manufactured articles are selling above pre-war prices, with even the retail and wholesale prices in the same line of industry out of gear. Moreover, the countries in Europe on whom we must depend for old-time activity are without credit to buy their usual amount of merchandise. Even if they had the credit, two or three hundred million of them are without any buying power at all.

A machine can not function properly unless its parts are working in accordance with their accustomed adjustments and nicety. That is the sum and substance of our world-wide commercial situation. We share in that and will continue to suffer from lack of balance until we all get together in some form of proportionate and balanced industry.

Therefore, in the writer's opinion, there will be no rush of business next year that will divert money from investment channels. On the contrary, it is probable that money will be diverted from business activities into investment channels. Further, it is believed that while prices are inflated and production curtailed and expansion limited, the money and credits that have been created to suit our war-time activities have not contracted to the same relative extent. It is not easy to contract money and credits until some time after the commercial activity for which they were issued has contracted.

The opinion is here expressed for the forthcoming year, that even if business is fairly active, the supply of money and credits will be greater than the demand. That means easy money. Now, easy money is the strongest basis for believing that we will have higher bond prices unless securities are issued so fast that the supply of them is greater than the demand. This is hardly probable with our Liberty Bond issues securely tucked away, as evidenced by their rising prices. We do not think that securities will be issued except on an improving bond market; for those responsible for the issuance of securities realize that too rapid emissions only glut the investment market; further, they understand, in that event, that they not only spoil the market for their securities, but cause a general lowering of all investment values. This makes future financing more difficult.

We can measure the amount of necessary financing by the rise in bond prices of the last six months. So precipitous a rise could have absorbed many more securities than have been issued. The result of a larger output would have been to keep securities on a lower level. They can not rise in the manner witnessed unless securities are scarce.

Our belief, therefore, that we shall see higher bond prices during the next year is founded on the following conclusions:

First, that the purchasing power of the dollar will increase.

Second, that huge amounts of Liberty Bonds have been absorbed and are not overhanging the market as a form of undigested investment securities.

Third, that business will not become so active as to tap investment sources.

Fourth, securities will not be issued in such amounts as to depress the investment market, but will be fed out on a market of rising prices.

Fifth, that the reaction from the turbulent times of the past seven years is to security rather than uncertainty; to investment rather than to speculation.

After having enjoyed a healthy reaction, as a result of profit-taking by speculators who bought during the recent advance, the bond market again shows signs of resuming its upward trend. If, as we expect, lower money rates appear during the next three months, bond prices can hardly be expected to remain at present levels. Good issues, of a seasoned character, can still be purchased at prices which seem ridiculously cheap in comparison with those before the war.

Inasmuch as normal conditions are rapidly returning, we can not help but feel decidedly optimistic concerning the future of the bond market. Prices will undoubtedly be marked up less rapidly in coming months than since last July. Nevertheless we expect a steadily advancing bond market at least until mid-summer, and believe it unwise to delay purchases in the expectation of obtaining more favorable prices in the early future.—McDonnell & Co.

Hunter, Dulin & Co. are offering a new issue of $150,000 Thornton Orchard Farms first mortgage 7½ per cent. gold bonds, due serially January 1, 1926 to 1934, inclusive. The issue is secured by a first mortgage or deed of trust on 996 acres of improved farm lands appraised at $318,000, which is over twice the amount of the loan. The property lies in San Joaquin and Sacramento counties, along the banks of the Mokelumne River, about thirty miles north of the city of Stockton. Ample transportation facilities are afforded by the state highway, which abuts on the north, the river on the south, and the Western Pacific Railroad on the west. Abundant water is derived from the Mokelumne River, in which this property enjoys riparian rights. Complete irrigation facilities owned by the company are operated at low cost. The management is under the direction of Mr. Frank C. Sloan, who is also in charge of the Canal Ranch of Libby, McNeil & Libby. The bonds are tax exempt in California and are offered subject to certification as legal investment for California savings banks. The offering price is 100 and interest, to yield 7.50 per cent.

The Freeman, Smith & Camp Company are offering an issue of Government of Queensland sterling 4½ per cent. bonds in denominations of £500 and £100, dated April 1, 1915, and due April 1, 1925.

The State of Queensland comprises the whole northwestern portion of the Australian continent. The area is 670,500 square miles and the population in 1921, exclusive of aborigines, was 750,634. Brisbane, the capital, has a population of 189,575. The government is in the hands of a governor, an executive council of ministers, and a parliament of two houses. The total value of all crops in 1919 was over $30,000,000, which consisted chiefly of maize, sugar, cane, bananas, pineapples, molasses, spirits, wheat, tobacco, and oranges. Forestry and grazing are important occupations. The wool production in this country is greater than that from any equal-sized section in the world. Minerals mined in this country in 1918 were valued at $16,000,000. The chief exports from this country are gold, silver, copper, tin, coal, wool, meat, tallow, hides and skins, sugar, pineapples, wheat, and molasses. There are 5469 miles of government-owned railroad in Queensland. In 1919-20 the surplus of government revenues over government expenditures (which includes interest on all outstanding fixed debts, external and internal) was $125,000.

face of the tremendous need for war-time financing and the tremendous issuance of war-time securities. After the war and after some twenty-odd billion dollars of Liberty Bonds had been absorbed, the market responded rapidly to a demand for investment securities; in fact, to such an extent that the rapid rise in bond prices evidenced almost a dearth of available investment securities. It is obvious that a rapid rise of this character would have been impossible with a continuous flow of available securities, sufficient in amount to satisfy the demand.

BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

When he talked here a week or so ago on the "writing game" Will Irwin spoke of the professional writer's routine, which usually takes the form of three hours' writing in the morning. Mr. Irwin further expressed the idea that if a writer missed his matutinal three hours of scribbling or typing his universe was off color until the following morning restored the author's equilibrium. That is one way of being temperamental, but I venture to say it is the most unusual way and that most writers write when either the exigency of pot-boiling or of artistic expression becomes too urgent to be deferred. Then the writer writes. I was reminded of all this with reference to the production of books of travel. The pure book of travels can not be written on the spot, for if it is it becomes little more than a traveling diary. It is true that that is all many travel books are—jotted superficial impressions. But the book of travels has a form of its own and that is not secured by diurnal entries. Daily notes have no perspective. One is reminded of the hero of Poe's story who, gazing out the window, saw an enormous paleolithic monster advancing across the lawn toward him. He stood fascinated, horrified for a moment that seemed an age, and then discovered that his monster was a fly crawling on the screen a few inches from his nose. No, the writer of a travel book, be it formal or informal, must first gather his impressions—we will give him leave to keep a diary—and then at a safe distance must mold them into the form of a book. And if I were writing such a book I would not write three hours a morning, but fifteen hours a day, to mold the white metal of my impressions while they were malleable. So much for the bone of contention of a tabloid working day for writers.

Of course, there are travels and travels. The ideal book of travels is not written by a traveler at all, but by a native. Naturally, it is so much the better if he has traveled elsewhere, but he should write his book about his native heath. Tagore has expressed his opinion somewhere about foreigners who have the audacity to interpret India. In the Indian poet's estimation, even so eminent a writer as Kipling has failed in his interpretations of India. Tagore simply says that Kipling does not understand India and therefore can not explain it. The same thing is true to a less degree of every country—even our own perspicuous America. Unlike the Indian, we constantly explain ourselves to the traveler. We fairly jump at the opportunity of self-exploitation. But we have never yet been satisfied with a foreigner's report of us. From Dickens to Suzanne Lenglen we have repudiated foreign interpretation. So we should take with a grain of salt the traveler's representation of any country. It is not only not as the native sees it, it is probably not as we ourselves would see it. The ideal professional writing traveler should be trained, even as a diplomat is trained, to understand the psychology of alien races, and he should be, moreover, an historian, an archaeologist, a physical geographer, and if possible an artist. The last requirement is not of primary importance. It is only important if he proposes to have his book illustrated. In a more general sense it would be admirable to select an artist when beginning the process of making a traveler, because artists have the observation and sensitivity that is the foundation of all successful travelers. Moreover, they make excellent archaeologists.

Without paying much attention to the sort of arbitrary rules I have been laying down, a great many people have recently produced books of travel. These have varied from the guide-book sort of thing to the serious study of the native genius. They have ranged again from the romantic diary to the archaeological and historical thesis. It is almost impossible to separate geography from history. And it is in the judicious combination of the two that the charm of well-written travel lies. But all of the foreign research that has been published has not been well written. Personally, I eschew the book loosely constructed on the diary of an amateur traveler, and have a distinct penchant for the book of a trained historical observer. The ideal illustration of this kind of literature is perhaps "French Civilization," by Albert Guérard, but nothing so happy as that has been published since. One of the best of interpretative travel books of the past few months is "A Picture of Modern Spain," by A. J. B. Trend (Houghton Mifflin; $4.50). A book that is halfway between travel and essay, and that is reminiscent of Pierre Loti's similar combination, "On Life's Byways," is "The Street of Faces," by Charles Vince (Dutton; $5). "A Loiterer in Paris," by Helen W. Henderson (Doran; $5), is the guide book par excellence so far as substance and illustrations are concerned, but its size and weight would be an obstacle to packing it about Paris with one. For the armchair traveler, however, it is ideal. Mechanically constructed for the traveler's pocket and eminently suited to his other needs is "A Fortnight in Naples," by André Maurel and translated by Helen Gerard (G. P. Putnam's Sons).

The most distinctive of these is "A Picture of Modern Spain," though either M. Maurel's book or Mr. Vince's is more "literary," and Miss Henderson's is equally historic. But "A Picture of Modern Spain" is not concerned with being literary and Mr. Trend is fully as historical as his thesis requires—a presentment of modern Spain. Moreover, he is full of Spanish history and the history of its literature, philosophy, and art. One finds oneself enthusiastically resolving to brush up his rudimentary knowledge of the language in order to tap this rich reservoir—much the greater part of which has never been translated—only to learn, alas, that there are three distinct languages in Spain proper—Basque, Catalan, and Castilian—"each of which has a number of recognized dialects," our author encouragingly informs us. And much of the most picturesque literature is in Catalan, a language "which not even God can understand," as they say in other parts of Spain. Our new-born ambition to study Spanish having died a premature death, we lose ourselves comfortably in "A Picture of Modern Spain" unhampered by any resolution, but gradually possessed of a great desire—the desire to see this extraordinary country ourselves. For Spain is unique in the world today. Of all civilized countries the least touched by the war, she has preserved her old culture intact and in the past few years has caught up with the times as we rather ironically express the idea of keeping abreast with the Allied nations. One learns with some degree of chagrin that the young Spanish intellectual—man or woman, by the way—rather looks down on the antiquated methods of Oxford and Cambridge. Women's colleges connected with the universities are a thriving institution in Spain, where, in fact, most middle-class women accept the higher education as a matter of course. Mr. Trend also deals with the Spanish political situation, a theme that runs persistently through his book and which evidently plays a very prominent part in Spanish life and letters. The radicals in Spain, one gathers, are pro-German. And Spain as a whole seems to have lost its political sympathies with the Allies. It is too lengthy a subject to treat adequately here. The curious are referred to the book, which will enrich almost any one's fund of information. Mr. Trend has made a long, thorough study of his subject from a sympathetic approach. His book does the unusual thing in living up to its title. One is sure that it is a picture of modern Spain.

The other three books are each interesting in their own field. It is noteworthy, I think, that all the prominent publishers are putting out books of travel. One traces everything nowadays to the war and makes it relate whether it will or no. But it seems reasonable to align the new thirst for knowledge of other countries with our recent cataclysm. A theory comfortably held by many scholars in the days of peace was that war was conducive to civilization. One would hesitate long and weightily before uttering that sentiment on one's own, today. But there is no doubt that war is an educative force. The question to be left with moral arbitrators is whether the education is worth the price, or possibly whether it could not be gotten less expensively. A writer to the New York Times comments on the fact that the public is discovering books—even the classics and solid informative literature. The sad fact is that it practically takes a war to stir lazy humanity into so unnatural and strenuous an act as the pursuit of knowledge. However, the publishers' lists are an indication of public demand. Novels and frothy stuff generally are in the minority. People are interested in biography because it is related to progress, travel because it is concerned with government and politics, and economics, which they have finally awakened to discover is the groundwork of what we fondly call civilization.

The report comes from England that the best seller in the non-fiction class at the present moment is "From Private to Field Marshal," by General Sir William Robertson, recently reviewed in these columns. The American edition of this book was brought out shortly before Christmas by the Houghton Mifflin Company. In this autobiography General Robertson tells the thrilling story of his rise from enlisted man to chief of the imperial staff in the late war.

Mark Twain's publishers, Harper & Brothers, describe the manner in which they discovered the origin of the name "Tom Sawyer." In 1903 they brought out a group of volumes which they called "Mark Twain's Best Books," and which were sold all over the country. One day, not long after, a Californian rushed into Harper's, very much excited because "Tom Sawyer" had not been included in the set. It developed that his name was Tom Sawyer, and that in Mark Twain's early days as a newspaper reporter the Sawyer café on the Barbary Coast was a great rendezvous for young fellows. According to Mr. Sawyer, Mark Twain seldom had money with which to pay for his meals, and his score of debts was marked upon a blackboard. In spite of the fact that the debts were never erased, young Twain was always welcome because of his inexhaustible fund of jokes and stories. Later he named his famous character after the proprietor.

Francis Hackett has written a preface for the new Macmillan edition of Hans Andersen's "Fairy Tales," in which he says: "Andersen took reality as it is, which children nearly all respect, and peopled it with his own daring yet reasonable creations, which children generally admire. Children worship heroes and heroism because they feel the need of heroism and want to be heroes themselves. It is because Hans Christian really lives like a child in the freshness of his senses and the quickness of his hope and fears that he has been able, in these imperishable tales, to win the allegiance of the most realistic of all audiences." Signe Toksvig edits the "Tales"; she is a Dane herself and knows the scenes of the stories and the spirit and atmosphere in which Anderson wrote. Eric Pape has illustrated the book beautifully and has incorporated many sketches and cutouts made by Andersen himself.

BRIEFER REVIEWS.

Marjorie Barstow Greenbie, who, by the way, is the wife of Sydney Greenbie, author of "The Pacific Triangle," has just published through Dodd, Mead & Co. a fascinating travel book, "In the Eyes of the East," which is out of the ordinary, in the fact that there is a real romance running throughout the story. Mrs. Greenbie is one of the few women to receive a degree of Doctor of Letters from Yale University. She lectured on English at Vassar College for two years, and during the war made a complete circuit of the globe and incidentally met the man who afterward became her husband. "In the Eyes of the East" is the story of her trip. Mrs. Greenbie voyaged across the Pacific into Japan, China, India, and, accompanied by an adventurous spirit that sheered away from no lurking danger, had experiences that come to few globe trotters, whether men or women. The insights that she gives into the life of the Chinese, Japanese, and Indians are genuine contributions to a much-needed understanding of the Eastern races. Yet with it all there is a love story, and the book throughout is permeated with the romantic. Few books of travel since "The Lady of the Decoration" has equaled this book in appeal.

The twelfth volume in the Chekhov Series, published by the Macmillan Company ($2), is "The Schoolmaster and Other Stories," translated by Constance Garnett. Some of the author's most characteristic work is in this volume, which includes, besides the title story, "A Tripping Tongue," "Oh! The Public," "Boots," "Betrothed," and "From the Diary of a Violent-Tempered Man." Bald tragedy, sardonic humor, and penetrating satire mark these stories, which are all distinguished by Chekhov's remarkable gift of condensation and the power of his simplicity.

A book that should go far toward cementing British and American friendship is "The Hope of the Future," by Edward E. Eagle (Cornhill Publishing Company; $2). Mr. Eagle has completed a tour of the British Empire in the interests of unifying his own impressions by first-hand observation and of dispelling the false impressions that many people retain of every country that they are not personally acquainted with. "The Hope of the Future," according to Mr. Eagle, and we heartily agree with him, lies in a friendly relation and understanding between the United States and the British Empire. An interesting feature of "The Hope of the Future" is the contribution by President Harding, Mr. Lloyd George, Mr. Meighan, Mr. William Hughes, Mr. Marsey, and Sir James Craig of forewords in which they echo the author's hope of the future accord of the two English-speaking nations.

A new volume, the thirteenth, in the Little Schoolmate Series, published by E. P. Dutton & Co., has just appeared. It takes its title, "Round Robin," from the name of a summer camp in Maine, near Bar Harbor, where the story is scene, and its author is Abbie Farwell Brown. All the previous volumes of this series, whose general editor is Florence Converse of the staff of the Atlantic Monthly, have dealt with the childhood in foreign countries of the girls and boys whose parents are among the immigrants to the United States—Little French, Russian, Spanish, Irish, Scotch, Greek, German, Belgian, Italian, Japanese, Mexican, Armenian children they are, and each of the stories aims to show American children and the children of these immigrants what was the background in their homeland of the boys and girls from the country with which it deals. The aim of the series is to aid in the melting-pot process by widening the knowledge and nourishing the understanding and the sympathy of the children who read the tales. The book is illustrated by Margaret Ely Webb.

A very attractive book for youngsters is "A Treasury of Plays for Children," edited by Montrose J. Moses and illustrated by Tony Sarg (Little, Brown & Co.; $3). This collection deserves high praise. One of Mr. Moses' specialties is the subject of children's literature, although he is better known as the editor of "Representative British Dramas." The anthology includes one of Tony Sarg's famous puppet plays, four fairy plays hitherto unpublished in this country, and such classic favorites as a dramatization of "Alice in Wonderland" and "Master Skylark" and the nursery favorite, "Punch and Judy."

Students of Shakespeare will be interested in a little book just published by E. P. Dutton & Co., "Chaucer, the Rival Poet in Shakespeare's Sonnets," by Hubert Ord, an English investigator of Shakespeare's work, life, and times. Recognizing the great number and variety of problems found in Shakespeare's "Sonnets," he has confined himself to a study of only two of them, the drift or underlying idea of many of the poems and the identity of the "Rival Poet" referred to in them. He has evolved a very interesting theory concerning these questions and in this sets forth the evidence to the "Rival Poet" sonnets where Shakespeare speaks of a man who has inspired him he is referring to Chaucer, and, second, that the underlying ideas of many of the sonnets were influenced by Chaucer's "Roman de la Rose." He thinks that the allusions in many of the sonnets are of a literary rather than of an erotic character and that it is improbable that Shakespeare was giving in the sonnets a connected revelation of his own love affairs.

Literary Notes.

Walter B. Pitkin's "Must We Fight Japan?" has been translated into Japanese by Lieutenant-General K. Sato, and has attracted wide attention in that country.

When Stefansson first went to England in 1904, his only literary pilgrimage was to Baker Street, where Sherlock Holmes used to live. His enthusiasm for Sherlock Holmes and detectives in general later brought him in contact with Sir Arthur Conan Doyle and William Burns.

Sadakichi Hartmann in his "A Note on the Portraits of Walt Whitman" regrets that the world has not yet been given a reliable artistic portrait of the gray poet, and concludes by saying: "Perhaps his best portrait will be written in words. Just a souvenir for the mind as John Burroughs made: 'Whitman was always gray, even in his early Washington days, gray suit, gray hat, gray beard—always made the impression of a gray, in gray tonality, composition.'"

George Henry Payne, author of "The History of Journalism in the United States" (Appleton), has just been notified that he has had knighthood conferred upon him in the order of Danilo I by Queen Milena of Montenegro for distinguished services in behalf of that country. The order was communicated through Commander Luigi Criscuolo, delegate in the United States International Committee for the Independence of Montenegro.

Dodd, Mead & Co. announce that they have taken over the entire American rights and interest in the publication list of the John Lane Company, including all stocks now in this country, all American copyrights, and a working alliance with the house of John Lane, Ltd., London. This is the most important purchase in the publishing field in many years and includes such active literary property as the books of W. J. Locke, Theodore Dreiser, Anatole France, G. K. Chesterton, Walter Crane, Kenneth Grahame, Lawrence Hope, Stephen Leacock, Rupert Brooke, Francis Thompson, Max Beerbohm, Ernest Dowson, and many others.

That Japan is taking an interest in the new theatre movement is evident from the request by a Japanese that he be allowed to translate "The Theatre of Tomorrow." "The Theatre of Tomorrow," by Macgowan (Boni & Liveright), is already being announced as a textbook of the drama in many schools and colleges.

Much new material is to be incorporated in the Vallima edition of the works of Robert Louis Stevenson, which is being published by Charles Scribner's Sons in cooperation with five British publishers of Stevenson's writings. All the new material available in England has been brought to America, and to this has been added a vast amount of manuscripts, letters, drawings, and bibliographical rarities owned in this country. The new material will include more than one hundred recently discovered poems, as well as about one hundred personal letters never before published. There is a story called the "The Waif Woman," which somehow had been overlooked by Stevenson himself. Other "finds" among the author's manuscripts include "The Owl" (a fragment), "The History of Henry Shovel" in fifteen chapters, "When the Devil Was Well," and a number of fragments. There are the first pages of a projected diary of Wellington, a preface to the "Master of Ballantrae," and a delightful mimic "war correspondence," which has a special introduction by Lloyd Osbourne, Stevenson's stepson.

"Terribly Intimate Portraits," one of the most interesting books on the spring list of Boni & Liveright, was written by a young Englishman named Noel Coward. Mr. Coward is just twenty-one; and is the youngest Englishman ever to have had a play produced. His first play was presented in 1920, and had a successful season in London. While Mr. Coward was in this country he sold a play here; wrote a couple of articles for Vanity Fair, and had a short story in the Metropolitan. "Terribly Intimate Portraits" is his first book.

Louis Hémon, the author of "Maria Chapdelaine," the first really fine piece of prose to come out of French Canada, was not a French-Canadian. He was a Breton who had gone off to Canada and had written his book out of his first-hand experiences on the farms. His sister describes him as a silent man who "fled from the world and loved solitude and meditation." After he had dispatched the manuscript of "Maria Chapdelaine" to France, the author started off to tramp across country from St. John's Lake, where the book was written. His plan was to follow on foot the Canadian Pacific Railway. At a curve in the line neither he nor his companion heard the approaching train and both were run over and killed. When the letter accepting his story was returned to Paris, marked "dead," there was nobody to whom it could be sent, nor any known source from which information could be obtained concerning the mysterious author. So the story was published in a newspaper, where the father of Louis Hémon first learned of its existence. He wrote to explain the relationship and thus the facts were obtained concerning this supposedly Canadian French novelist. A white marble monument has been erected on the spot where he was killed, and in 1919 a commemorative stone was placed at Péribonka, near St. John's Lake, on the farm where he wrote "Maria Chapdelaine." The Geographical Society of Quebec has renamed two lakes, Lake Hémon and Lake Chapdelaine, in honor of the author who has given French-Canadian literature its first novel to transcend the limits of what has hitherto been a mere by-path of modern letters.

Sir Sidney Colvin, intimate friend and editor of R. L. S., has devoted a chapter of his book of memoirs to Stevenson. Because of his advanced age Sir Sidney has found it necessary to forego the writing of a full biography, as he long had planned to do, and has compressed his memoirs into a single volume. Few men of the last fifty years have enjoyed a more notable circle of friends. "Memories and Notes of Persons and Places" is published by Charles Scribner's Sons.

Dr. Horace Meyer Kallen is the man whom William James chose to edit his unfinished book, "Some Problems in Philosophy." Dr. Kallen is one of the leading teachers of philosophy in the United States. Educated at Harvard, at Oxford University, and La Sorbonne, Dr. Kallen has lectured in philosophy at Harvard, Clark College, the University of Wisconsin, and is now lecturing at the New School of Social Research in New York.

The eight illustrations for D. H. Lawrence's travel book, "Sea and Sardinia" (Seltzer), were done by Jan Jura. Mr. Jura is the son of Sir Henry Jura, Judge President of the Union of South Africa. He was a pupil of the Slade School in London. His best recommendation, he says, is the fact that Mr. Lawrence, who was attracted to his work in Italy, selected him to illustrate his book.

The Poetry Society of America announces that the prize of $500 offered in the William Lindsey Contest for poetic drama has been awarded to Harry Lee for his four-act play, "Il Poverello." One hundred and forty-five plays were submitted in the contest. The judges were George P. Baker, George Arliss, Jessie B. Rittenhouse, Jane Dransfield, and Stuart Walker.

SAN FRANCISCO OAKLAND LOS ANGELES SACRAMENTO

THE FRIENDLY ARCTIC. By Vilhjalmur Stefansson. New York: The Macmillan Company. The story of five years in Polar regions.

Words have a romance all their own. MacAdam was a road builder, Guillotine a compassionate physician, Derrick an inventor. General Silhouette first devised the cut-out which in the hands of a few has been raised to the point of genuine art. Lord Sandwich made a hasty repast at the gaming table. The spurious jewelry called pinchbeck is made of a cheap alloy first used by a jeweler of that name. Mrs. Bloomer set the feminine world ago in her day. Mr. Boycott was a landlord in Ireland whose tenantry refused to pay their rentals until certain of their demands were granted.

It has been an historically accepted fact that Christopher Columbus was born at Genoa, Italy. But it is now contended by a member of the Portuguese Academy of Science that Columbus was a native of Portugal. The statement of Senhor Ribeiro comes on the heels of an announcement by Right Rev. Monsignor Rey Soto, upon his arrival in New York recently, that Columbus was a Jew. The prelate said that this was proved by documents discovered at the home of ancestors of Columbus in Spain.

Library Specialist.

There are many libraries hereabout, both public and private, but far too many of them lack the systematization that would make them serviceable in the best sense. Mr. Elbert Emrie Lawrence, a library specialist, whose services are available, has the experience that would make many a mere jumble of books a thing of real value. Mr. Lawrence has the means through his acquaintance with the world's dealers, of securing treasures that are unattainable to other than the expert. He has been especially successful with private libraries.

"IT PAYS TO SMILE."

The play at the Columbia, dramatized by Ethel Watts Mumford from Nina Wilcox Putnam's serial of ranch life in California, which ran in the Saturday Evening Post, is an amiable conspiracy against gravity, into which May Robson enters with her usual thorough-going heartiness. It can not be said that May Robson has blazed out any new histrionic path in depicting the correctly polysyllabic Miss Freedom Talbot, scion of an old and exclusive if poverty-stricken Boston family, who is exacting in her ideas of what is socially decorous and genteel.

May Robson, indeed, does not need to blaze out any new paths. All she needs to do to please her audience is to dig up some new play in which she figures as the leading, if middle-aged character, jolly, hearty, un conventionally truthful, and steadily amusing, even in the midst of the sob stuff that she knows how to interpolate. It always goes, for that same pleasant heartiness in her fun enters into her sentiment, and she gives the heart muscles some refreshing exercise.

The Freedom Talbot described a paragraph or so back is the Freedom Talbot of Miss Putnam's serials, but having passed through a Robsonian transition, she now becomes exclusively May Robson's creation. But the original story offered possibilities which the jolly comedienne was quick to avail herself of; suitability of age, yet prominence in the action for the Boston spinster, a melodramatic tinge to the story which made it lend itself readily to being dramatized, and a Californian freshness, breeziness, and unconventionality to the character of the millionaire rancher and his spoiled but warm-hearted daughter.

One can imagine how May Robson jumped at the opportunity, and how well Miss Putnam must have been pleased to have the dramatization of her story fall into the hands of such a popular player. That May Robson's Freedom Talbot is not wholly Nina Wilcox Putnam's doesn't count particularly, for she is, partly, in respect, I mean, to the Californian influences moderating Miss Talbot's Boston starchiness and to the wild spirit of courageous adventurousness that warmed her almost elderly veins when she sensed the melodramatic happenings that were transpiring under the comfortable surface.

There was a good deal of orchard in the original story. In fact, fruit farmers in the country around Chico and Oroville—I think it was—were quite elated over the advertisement being given to the orange-raising industry in northern California, which was already attracting the attention of Middle West intending investors; for sections in Northern California can put it over Southern California on account of their immunity from destructive frosts; and Nina Wilcox Putnam rather hammered that and other points in her story, which must have greatly endeared her to the north and possibly highly exasperated the south. (Perhaps she has an orange grove in Northern California; at any rate, she knows a lot about orange culture.)

However, all this doesn't and needn't count in the play, which is constructed for amusement, pure and simple. May Robson has a regular San Francisco following—some of whom sent her stacks of welcoming flowers Monday night—and it doesn't make her vehicle any the less acceptable that the genial atmosphere of California is invoked to melt the slightly sluggish currents of Miss Freedom Talbot's blue Bostonian blood.

Of the satisfactory company surrounding Miss Robson, Margaret Borough scored as "Peaches," the alert young Californian being as brisk as a lively fox-terrier in her depiction of "Peaches'" temper, her warm-heartedness, and her frank unconventionality. The youth and appearance of the young lady are also in keeping, for she is briskly un-Verre-de-Verish and very American.

The "dook," by the way, ought to have modified some of his Americanness of appearance with a few artful touches, but I suppose he was trying to steer clear of the danger of looking like a handsome "wop," as old Peg called him. Russell Hicks gave to the rôle youth, good looks, a tall, athletic figure, and a fine, full, deep voice, but the young man has a bad habit of swallowing his own words; which doesn't agree with the mental digestion of his listeners.

Henry Crosby gave a particularly good representation of "Pinto" Pegg, the genial old millionaire, grown-up urchin, and mingling of artless ruralite and practiced New York hotel patron. He gave him a genuine note in the midst of comedy that made no pretense of being wholly natural.

Orrin T. Burke was rather too orotund as the unscrupulous abstracter of Italy's art treasures, Don Harrington was nicely shiny-haired and youthful as the chauffeur whom genial Pinto and the coltish young "Peaches" unconcernedly treated as a member of the family, and Edith Conrad was duly heedful of the American countess' clothes and modernness.

Fun and jollity in May Robson, youth and a love story, Western unconventionality, a touch of melodrama, open and avowed purpose to amuse, and only to amuse, these make up the elements of "It Pays to Smile."

"MILESTONES"

This popular Arnold Bennett play, which won favor on its first appearance all over the country, and has been presented with first-class support during two different seasons in San Francisco, is being played at the Maitland this week, and still stoutly holds its own.

The subject of family bonds and family ramifications has always interested Arnold Bennett, and "Milestones" is a finely dramatic expression of that interest. It is rather a remarkable play in the simple naturalness with which the family sequence is worked out. The opening, with the members of the Rhead and Sibley family, composed of youth and middle age, grouped in the Victorian drawing-room, which was successfully indicated, the young lovers pairing off, and the reminiscent feelings sure to be evoked by the old-time music and atmosphere, were all as flagrantly enjoyable as an old-fashioned posy. Then came stern realism with something very like a family row, and the play became part of the panorama of life.

And so it continues to the end; the budding, blooming, fruitifying, and fading of splendid, confident youth: the hardening into dominant, authoritative, invincible, worldly middle age; the granite-like inaccessibility to other ideas and wills of prosperous old age.

It is rather daunting to human self-conceit, this play; for it causes us to realize how much our brain-cells can lose their flexibility as old age advances. The point is made so well by showing John Rhead in his youth, the brilliant pioneer in the idea of replacing wooden ships by iron ones, and John Rhead in his middle age deriding the idea of replacing ships of iron with vessels of steel.

Arnold Bennett and Edward Knobloch, his collaborator, were particularly successful in depicting British family life and relationships in the upper middle class; the class with which John Galsworthy's Forsyths are so thoroughly identified. And they did not fail to indicate the change in young girlhood as the periods followed each other, and we saw Rose, the young Victorian, droop her eyes shamefacedly and shed decorous tears over her lover's proposal, while the Honorable Muriel Pym of the twentieth century bristled and became a fighter, when the family yoke threatened her young neck.

Mr. Maitland's company gave an adequate representation of the diverse rôles, Mr. Maitland himself, Miss Penman, and Miss Hélène Marchand being particularly successful in representing the changing age phases of the characters represented. No one has as yet succeeded Mr. John Fee, except that Mr. Al Cunningham, formerly a most useful member of the Alcazar company, and Mr. William Guilbert are seconding Mr. Maitland in the important male rôles, and doing their commendable best to help out during the interim.

Miss Dorothy Wetmore, on account of a tendency to a lachrymose tone in her speech, appeared to better advantage as a mother than as a daughter, and Emily Calquist as Muriel and Carrie Lamont as Nancy did useful service in rounding out the family group.

CO-OPERATION OF PLAYERS.

Much interest was felt in the cooperative plan adopted by the Russian Grand Opera Company—who, by the way, are giving a farewell operatic concert at the Native Sons Hall on Saturday afternoon—which makes every member of the company a shareholder. A hit made means a bigger share for the bitter, and a sinking fund for sickness meets with the heartfelt approbation of the humbler members.

It is odd and interesting that this group of Russian singers, who flourished and were prosperous during the epoch of autocracy, should have formed a cooperative business association partaking, in some degree, of the principles animating the new Russian rulers from whose tyranny they fled.

But its efficacy has yet to be proved. Many of us believed, from the mistaken statements made in the press, that they had instituted their cooperative organization prior to their four or five years' touring in Russia. And we Californians, so far off from the first-class players that greedy New York absorbs, asked ourselves why, during these hard times, a group of players could not organize similarly, tour the country, and not forget San Francisco.

Well, as it turns out, the thing was done. A New York company organized to stage revivals of old successes. They were strong in such names as Wilton Lackaye, Harry Mestayer, Charlotte Walker, Edmund Lowe, and Jeffreys Lewis.

They chose "Trilby" for a starter, William Brady, who owns the play, giving his consent to their using it. Wilton Lackaye, of course, was regarded as a good drawing card in his well-remembered rôle of Svengali.

They opened at the National Theatre, New York, played a few nights—three, I believe—and then fell apart with a loud crash. Rows, we hear, caused the disintegration; disagreements about the disposition of rôles.

The Russian people, it seems, did not try cooperation in the Orient. They organized in Seattle, and the experiment is only just under way. The experience of the "Trilby" people would seem to indicate that actors can not act and produce simultaneously. Somebody's got to run them.

Luckily for them, the Russians have an experienced leader in Impresario Federoff, who has guided their destinies through their four years in the Orient. Mr. Federoff, who was, in his youth, an opera singer, has figured in the storied past as impresario of several prominent Russian opera companies, among others of the Moscow Opera Company and of the Imperial Theatre in Petrograd. Just how much this means we don't know, but these high-sounding names seem to indicate an important work in the past. At any rate, Mr. Federoff has been connected with Russian theatres for thirty-four years, and if the cooperative scheme doesn't work, I doubt not that he will collect the pieces that fly during the first row and fit them together again. For the Russians have a very distinct and potentially profitable asset in their nationality and in their repertoire, and we in San Francisco, who showed our keen interest by the record of our attendance during their successful season here, will with continued interest watch their progress from here to the more densely settled territories which should bring them equal interest and larger profits. It certainly looks as if, should they continue to hold together, they should reap a large harvest of American shekels.

HAPPY ENDINGS.

Eugene O'Neill, now one of the most prominent of American playwrights, has written a long communication to the press in which he points out the failure of the New York critics to understand the deeper issues of his new play, "Anna Christie." The communication is interesting in that it gives us a glimpse of a challenging personality. And it is further interesting because it is interpretative of the play.

Dramatists do not generally bother about interpreting. They are too busy. They leave it to the critics and the audiences to disagree, and generally, when their feelings are exacerbated, make no sign.

But Eugene O'Neill, irritated by the assumption of the critics that his play had ended, when, in fact, the wider and deeper drama of life had only begun for the pair who ventured to marry against the record of the woman's soiled past, broke the bonds of silence.

Mr. O'Neill draws the attention of those who have damned him in the past for having unhappy endings, and damn him in the present for a happy one, to the expressed forebodings of old Chris, the father, and also to faint anticipatory terrors that shake the souls of the presumably happy pair.

In fact, the author says that the last, foreboding mutterings, to which, apparently, audience and critics paid little heed, are as full of drama as anything in the play.

For marriage in Mr. O'Neill's conception is a stormy sea, upon whose treacherous surface the steerers of the matrimonial bark may not hope for peaceful sailing.

Another well-known playwright, more sentimental and less stern than Eugene O'Neill, agrees with him. "The Married Woman," by Chester Bailey Fernald, recently put on at a New York theatre, embodies Mr. Fernald's expressed conviction that marriage starts something, instead of ending everything.

There is nothing particularly original about the idea nowadays. But the attitude of the New York critics—such, at least, as took issue with the "happiness" of Mr. O'Neill's ending—is the unconscious result of two old, once firmly-rooted conventions of the theatre—one, that ladies with a past must, in the drama, be denied a subsequent wedding; two, that marriage always means a happy ending.

It does, of course, unless there are intimations, faint, atmospheric premonitions of disaster or doom. But Mr. O'Neill gave them, and still his critics were deaf.

There is, however, something greatly reassuring in Eugene O'Neill's success. He has a tendency to sombreness. One can not but remark the characteristic as expressed in his portraits. But he sees much with clear vision, unhampered by the traditions of the past. As he truly says, "It is my business—and that of every playwright worth his or her salt—to drop such doddering old traditions as the kiss-marriage-happily-ever-after down the manhole—if only to see what happens."

What happened in his case was the sitting up of the world to take notice, for this young man gives us plays that leave vistas of potential happenings haunting us when his plays are concluded; which is what we should feel after seeing every real play.

Yvette Guilbert is one of those who sees beyond the mere falling of the curtain. In words that constitute something of a rebuke to those who conceive the ending of "Anna Christie" to be happy, she says: "I have not even conceived in the play the 'happy ending' which our critical wizards thought they detected. The marriage of Anna Christie might, perhaps, be considered as a 'happy ending,' but it is the beginning of the unhappy life of Anna. She will be a martyr, walking on the eternal volcano of her husband's never-to-be-appeased jealousy. At least, so I understand the author."

JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

According to "A Book of Old Embroidery" (London: The Studio), the earliest example of needlework known to exist comes from the tomb of a Pharaoh fifteen hundred years before Christ, and there is some Greek work dating from the third century before the Christian era. The well-known Bayeux tapestries, commemorating the Norman conquest, may have been wrought by English hands, though their origin is uncertain, but there is a remarkable example of Anglo-Saxon needlework, done just a thousand years ago, in some church vestments in Durham Cathedral. English embroidery of the thirteenth century was much in favor and in demand throughout Europe. A great quantity of needlework was done in the times of Queen Elizabeth and James I. Considering that the population was only one-eighth of the number of the present time, the quantity known to be produced shows that this beautiful and elaborate work must have been diligently practiced in every house of any consideration.

The Columbia Theatre.

It pays to smile and once in a great while to drop a tear as proven by May Robson in her new comedy-drama, "It Pays to Smile," now on at the Columbia Theatre. It is a dramatization of the Nina Wilcox Putnam stories, and gives the star and her splendid supporting cast opportunity to entertain in a most attractive fashion.

Miss Robson as the elderly spinster who undertakes to hold the check rein on a young daughter of a California ranch owner has never won her audiences so completely. Her work each season wins her a greater number of admirers, and in "It Pays to Smile" she captivates every one in the big audiences. The emotional scene of the first act is set in a framework of comedy and all concerned in this production are to be praised for their exceptional work. The second week of the engagement opens Monday. Matinees Wednesday and Saturday.

The Orpheum.

In "A Man of Affairs," which is described as a comic slice of life, Eddie Buzzell fulfills the prophecies of his admirers. It is a unique little musical comedy having to do with a young chap of rural persuasion and his sweethearts; the girl at home in the country, the Broadway flapper, and the young thing past middle age with matrimonial intent.

This year Nat Nazarro has departed materially from his customary routine. Variety plays an important part in his present offering. It includes instrumental music, song, dance, and a lot of comedy. Most of this is provided by Buck and Bubbles, two phenomenal pickaninnies, who are said to be the "find" of the "finds." These two dusky youngsters are natural comedians.

Cliff Nazarro is the youngest of the famous Nazarro family and like his brother, Nat Nazarro, he followed his father's footsteps only as far as the stage door. Cliff Nazarro, with the assistance of the Darling Sisters, has formed a trio which is said to compose vaudeville's cleverest juveniles.

Beatrice Sweeney is both picturesque and daring and her series of feats are accomplished on the trapeze and flying rings. Part of these are done while the dainty athlete hangs to her apparatus by her teeth.

Fink's Mules is an unusual animal act. These mules not only accomplish a series of remarkable feats, but do them willingly. With the exception of Jim Dump, Fink's mules do not even seem to be obstinate. Jim Dump is not only contrary, but absolutely unrideable. He is the clown of his species and he provides more laughter than most comedians.

On account of their enormous success this week Clark and Bergman in "Tunes of the Hour," Lillian Shaw with some new characterizations, and Joe Morris and Flo Campbell in their great comedy act will remain a second week to entertain Orpheum patrons.

The Maitland Playhouse.

"Jane Clegg," one of the most widely discussed of modern plays in the magazines, the big success of the Actors' Guild of New York, and never before produced outside that city, is ready for presentation at the Maitland Playhouse and will open next Monday night.

Director Maitland has been exceptionally fortunate in securing the rights to "Jane Clegg," the play of the hour, of which theatre-goers in this section have read so much. Jane Clegg is the wife of a shallow clerk in London, who suffers much from his actions, but ultimately triumphs over all obstacles.

"Milestones," that charming drama by Arnold Bennett and Edward Knobloch, is the offering this week, and the critics have spoken in enthusiastic terms of the performance given. "Milestones" will close with the Saturday matinee and evening performance.

"Wait Till We're Married."

Terry Duffy in "Wait Till We're Married" commences a two weeks' engagement at the Columbia Theatre, Monday, January 30th. Under the direction of Oliver Morosco, "Wait Till We're Married," written by Hutcheson Boyd and Rudolph Bunner, was originally presented at the Playhouse in New York. It is said to be a domestic comedy of the most wholesome sort, possessing a romantic flavor and dealing principally with the amusing difficulties in which two young lovers—one a boy of the most humble means, who has been reared by two maiden aunts, and the other a wealthy, dashing young girl—find themselves involved when their respective financial and social position threaten to wreck their hopes of matrimony. It is said to be the biggest laugh-producer attraction Morosco has had in many seasons. The original company, headed by Terry Duffy, has been kept intact. Mr. Duffy has been taking Eastern playgoers by storm and has been acclaimed the greatest interpreter of Irish characterization since the days of Lillie Scanlon and Joe Murphy. Besides Mr. Duffy, the typical Morosco cast includes the following company of carefully selected players: Barbara Brown, Fanny Yantis, Marie Van Tassel, Mary Hill, Ted W. Gibson, Andrew Arbuckle, William Austin, and Maxwell Paley.

Leopold Godowsky.

A recent interview elicited from Leopold Godowsky the information that he had been practically his own teacher. "I consider myself practically self-taught," said Godowsky, "for a few months at the Berlin Hoch-Schule only served to show me that I could learn nothing from dull and conventional schemes of instruction. The value of self-teaching is of course obvious. It stimulates the working out of problems which otherwise a diploma solves. Many students feel that if they have done enough work to receive a diploma they are entitled to rest on that visible sign of learning, and consequently never develop any real individuality. However, it would be unwise to advocate self-teaching for all. The great majority need the guidance of a matured mind and a ripened experience." The Russian pianist is to appear in recital at the Scottish Rite Auditorium on Sunday afternoons, March 19th and 26th.

The latest work of Leonid Andreyev, now being played in New York City, "He, The One Who Gets Slapped," is a decided novelty that is now in course of preparation for the Maitland Playhouse. Another first production in this country for the Maitland is the A. A. Milne play, "The Lucky One." It is considered by Mr. Milne his best work. Milne has two plays running in New York City at the present time and one in London. He is the author of "Belinda" and "Mr. Pym Passes By."

Now that aluminum has become available in any desired quantity, its use in electric installations, especially for long-distance conductors of electric power, is rapidly increasing. For equal conductivity only half the weight of aluminum is required that would be required if copper were used. The price of aluminum, just before the war, fell to about the same rate per ton as that of copper. Experiments have been under way for some time to increase the tensile strength of aluminum conductors by alloying the metal with a little copper.

THE NEW STAGE SCENERY.

Scenography—or the craft of making scene for drama—is a very old craft, and there have been many brilliant exponents of the craft (writes Gordon Craig in the Manchester Guardian). The oldest system was to build the scene of stone and marble. This was the noblest period. The next was to make it of wood and canvas, or wood and paper, and to paint the surface to resemble streets, houses, forests, mountains, seas, rivers—whatever was wanted. This, in the hands of men like Torelli, Pozzo, the Bibienas, or Bakst, was often a brilliant and always a showy affair. Exactly how long this system has been in use I do not know, but from 1400 it has grown in popularity.

And now a third system has come along, in which light does the painting. And this is the best system because proper to the stage, it being out of place to use there (on the three-dimensional stage) the paints of the landscape painter, whose whole study is how to deal with his paints on a canvas of two dimensions. This system has not come as quickly as the journals would lead us to suppose. I mean it has not been born this year. For some centuries a few men have been searching how to use light in the scene—not merely how to light a painted scene, but how to use light on a scene that was not painted. Shadows was what interested them. They did not bring their experiments into theatres for reasons both obvious and subtle. The obvious ones are trade reasons, the subtle ones human. The experimenter is often less eager to sell than to discover, to find out than to impart.

My opinion of the whole new system is that it is the only right one for the modern era. I have for quite a long while now said that painting scenes with paint is out of place and out of date in theatres, and I have for just as long hinted that light should be used, so I am naturally pleased to see it coming along—to see it also coming into England.

When I say that eight or nine years ago I knew how to paint scenes with light you must not please imagine that I claim to be the inventor of the new system, and I hope that modern journalism will not confuse people by announcing that the inventor of the system has been discovered, for he is not discoverable. Inventors of several methods applicable to the system can, on the other hand, be announced and welcomed, and three gentlemen have already put in claims to such methods. There is M. André of Stockholm, whom Dr. Helman believes in and supports liberally ("Bravo, Doctor!"); there is Herr Hasait, who has the support of the director of the Dresden state opera in Germany (Mr. Grein announced him lately); and there is, thirdly, Mr. Samoiloff of Petrograd, of whom you tell us. What are the technical methods of these three I can't say, but the idea is the right one.

I do not think great beauty or expression will be achieved very rapidly, for the difficulty, after getting convinced that light is of immense value in the art of the theatre, is to know why it is of value, and how it can be used, and what steps lead to a real success, and what dangers must be avoided. For when dealing with light (one of the most difficult of mediums to use with wit and cunning) you may in a moment go astray and produce valueless results to our sense of taste. Flashy results can be produced in a trice, just as the same flashy results can be produced if you give paints and brushes or a flute or a violin into the hands of men who have nothing to say with these instruments. The artist is some one who has something to say worth listening to, so this new system of painting scenes with light must yield very fine results in the hands of a great artist, and very poor ones in other hands.

But the system remains right as rain whatever method fail. The direction, the path, is perfectly right: it is the turnings we must look on with suspicion, not only we the on-lookers, but we the workers. We must not take the wrong turning in the maze—a maze purposely made deceptive for us by the blessed nature of things.

There is one very clear fact these three foreign methods—the Swedish, German, and Russian—prove to us; it is that large workshops and some workmen and experiments are necessary to each artist before results are to be achieved which can be of value. And I think that these three foreigners will agree that even then matters can not be rushed. Good results can not be expected without proper time in which to make sufficient experiments and to digest tentative results. I say this because how ready is every one today—every would-be patron—to expect results after a short time of laboring and with languid financial backing.

lived with his employer's family in Jamaica. He was a lazy, impractical youth who was always under foot and a sore trial to Mrs. Brenton, the practical, busy New England wife of the editor, writes her daughter-in-law.

"Mrs. Brenton always emphasized, when speaking of Whitman, that he was inordinately indolent and lazy and had a very pronounced disinclination to work! During some of the time he was in the household the apple trees in the garden were in bloom. When Whitman would come from the printing office and finish the mid-day dinner, he would go out into the garden, lie on his back under the apple tree, and forget everything about going back to work as he gazed up at the blossoms and the sky. Frequently at such times Mr. Brenton would wait for him at the office for an hour or two and then send the 'printer's devil' up to the house to see what had become of him. He would invariably be found still lying on his back on the grass looking into the tree entirely oblivious of the fact that he was expected to be at work. When spoken to, he would get up reluctantly and go slowly back to the shop. At the end of such a day Mr. Brenton would come home and say, 'Walt has been of very little help to me today. I wonder what I can do to make him realize that he must work for a living?' and Mrs. Brenton would remark, 'I don't see why he doesn't catch his death of cold lying there on the ground under that apple tree!'"

Perfection is a laudable ambition worthy to be cherished, particularly when the goal is some one else's perfection. Holy Writ enjoins us to "go on to perfection," and it is doubtless this biblical sanction that has encouraged the present tidal wave toward the unparagoned shores of perfectness. As of old, the perfect woman is sought. That search is not a fad, but like the poor is always with us. The perfect man is an easy step, since we have become connoisseurs of perfection. The perfect hand, the perfect foot, have become almost as commonplace as the perfect thirty-six. We are athirst for new perfections. So far from being a decadent age, as the pessimists declare, we are an age of super-paragons. Paul Swan, who is fully as notorious for his iconoclastic theory that masculine beauty is more beautiful than the same degree of feminine pulchritude, has been hailed for years as the perfect man. Audrey Munson, as all devotees of perfection know, is his close second, the perfect woman. Strangely enough, in perfection, as in other things, there are differences of degree and kind. This may seem paradoxical, but an illustration will prove the thesis. When one thinks of Audrey Munson, one thinks of the perfect woman, but no one for a moment confuses her perfection with that of a perfect housekeeper, a perfect wife, or a perfect disposition. Though the possessors of these latter will maintain that they, too, are perfect women. The recipe of one aspirant for a wifely paragon is one that will "raise her food and cook it, make her own clothes, and get back to the simple life." But that is a far cry from Audrey's perfection. From all of which it would seem that each of us can establish the limits of perfection. From internal evidence, we are all perfect.

It is with a smirk of satisfaction that man steps into the white light of discussion once more. He has been so long superseded by friend wife as a target for criticism and approval and general publicity that it is with genuine relief he has awakened to find himself notorious. For a few brief days the paragraphers and columnists have passed up caustic comment on such fresh subjects as bobbed hair, shaved eyebrows, and ladylike cigars to discuss the new cult—new forsooth!—of the mustache. We suspect our confrères of raising hirsutical decorations, not because Lord Lascelles sports Victorian mustachios, but because they are tired of obscurity and will risk anything for a little beloved publicity. As many a philosopher has discovered, man is the vainer of the two sexes. He is more self-conscious for one thing, and more lost in the marvel of his superiority. Woman takes hers for granted. So that it is not marvelous that a desperate bid is being made on the part of united masculinity for some much-needed attention. All this bobbed-hair-street-knickers-jeweled-pipe publicity has practically been wasted on the women, but a tenth of it makes the average man feel a really consequential person. We haven't any apprehension, seriously, that the mustache is coming back. It is too unbecoming, and man, unlike woman, knows his limitations. But it is a clever bid anyway, and should go far towards restoring our amour propre.

One of the signs that foreshadow a return of the mustache is the number of unshorn lips worn by men who loom large in world affairs just now. Not merely is Mary's flancé quoted. Lloyd George, Briand, Mr. Balfour, and most significant of all, Micky Collins are wearers of the tufted lip. Mic's, by the way, may be of short duration. He is reported to be taking a holiday for a honeymoon. An arbitrary decision on the part of the unknown lady who is marrying the Irish chief may alter masculine face fashions for a decade. For there is little doubt that the handsome young hero of the Irish mix-up is the chief inspiration of the threatened style. Already the billboards are portentous. The latest broadsheet advertising the merits of Prince Albert tobacco is an unmistakable portrait of Mic Collins himself. At present the fate of hirsutical superfluities hangs in the balance. But we are optimistic. Mic is a newly-made Benedict.

In a photoplay recently shown here Audrey Munson purported to tell the story of her life. This was calculated to draw crowds, particularly among laymen. Artists and artist models know the shabby interior of Bohemia, but fortunately for motion-picture receipts, the public is largely made up of respectable people whose curiosity can be counted on. The only remarkable thing about this picture was its lack of verisimilitude. The naive layman came away with the impression of Bohemia as a place where superlatively squeamish models were hunted by dissolute rousés posing as art students and dissolute art students who had no need to pose as rousés. A virtuous artist or two flitted across the scene for the sake of variety. Miss Munson as the heroine of her own story gives us a touching interpretation of the scruples of a professional model to pose sans clothing. The young lady was ultimately induced to pose in what in studios is known as the altogether only when her guide, philosopher, and friend, an aged and angelically virtuous artist, assured her that it was a legitimate phase of the profession. This, though our heroine was a professional model whose time, as she piously told the villain, was entirely taken up at the studios, and though the caption unctuously informed us that she had inspired most of the celebrated sculptors at home and abroad. The matter is intrinsically trivial, but it is indicative of the rubbish that the movies perpetrate.

San Francisco has a vaudeville taste. It is natural, perhaps, since she is more steadily exposed to vaudeville than to any other form of theatricals. But the result is that our criterion of good stage work is good, snappy vaudeville work. The thing was painfully illustrated Tuesday night at the performance of the Pavlowa ballets, "Amarilla" and "Dionysius." Pavlowa's "incomparable" art was, of course, well received, though many people were frankly disappointed. Plainly it was not trapezoidal enough. It was not a good vaudeville "stunt." However, what the audience lacked in response to that personification of the dance, Pavlowa, it made up in its wild enthusiasm for her dancing partner's athletics. Now, Novikoff is a splendid dancer. He would not be with Pavlowa if he was not. But it was not even his terpsichorean skill that brought down the house. It was the several fantastic decorations of pure muscular strength that won him salvos of applause. He could leap higher than Pavlowa, and commensurate with the height of his leap and the exhibition of his muscular endurance was his reward. The moral is apparent.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

Mr. Jones at a dinner party had been trying to say something nice to his hostess. "What a small appetite you have, Mr. Jones," she remarked. "To sit next to you, Mrs. Smith," he replied, "would cause any man to lose his appetite." And then he wondered why he wasn't invited to the next affair.

When Freddy came home from school he was crying. "Teacher whipped me because I was the only one who could answer a question she asked the class," he wailed. Freddy's mother was both astounded and angry. "I'll see the teacher about that! What was the question she asked you?" "She wanted to know who put the glue in her ink bottle."

The wealthy uncle was talking over the prospects of his nephew with the boy's mother. "How is he doing with his studies?" "Oh, very well. He's very intelligent; he shows a great talent for music, and his manner is very haughty. His teacher thinks he will become a conductor!" "Ah! Indeed!" responded his uncle; "bus or trolley car?"

Johnny had used some unparliamentary language, much to his mother's distress. "Johnny," she cried, "do stop using such dreadful expressions. I can't imagine where you pick them up." "Well, mother," replied Johnny, "Shakespeare uses them." "Then don't play with him again," commanded his mother; "he's not a fit companion for you, I'm sure."

They used to say of the late Louis James that he was one of the greatest humorists and practical jokers in stage history. It is recounted of him that on a certain occasion, in one of the Shakespearean tragedies, having to shake hands with a brother tragedian, he left clutched inescapably in the latter's fist a fat, raw oyster, which the unfortunate individual was obliged to keep by him through the remainder of the scene.

The pile of flints still to be broken was a very large one, thought the stone-breaker, as he gazed at it disconsolately between his bites at a large sandwich of bread and cheese. A minister came along and gave him a cheery "Good-morning," remarking afterward that he had a deal of work to get through yet. "Aye," said the eater, "them stones are like the Ten Commandments." "Why so?" inquired the genial parson. "You can go on breaking 'em," came the reply, "but you can't never get rid of 'em."

One hot July afternoon a tired and very dusty little colored lad chanced to be passing a reservoir quite a distance from home. The water looked so cool and inviting that Sambo could not resist, and a few moments later found him splashing around to his heart's content. The keeper, upon discovering him, rushed up and called out, "Hey, there! Come out of that! Don't you know that people in town have to drink that water?" Sambo dived under again, came up, and innocently replied: "Oh, dat's all right, suh, I aint usin' no soap!"

Little Dorothy had just returned from a short visit to her Aunt Elsa in Washington when the minister made his annual call upon her very religious mother. After her mother had flutteringly seated him on the plush sofa in front of the fire, the minister turned to Dorothy. "Well, my dear, did you have a nice time at your Aunt Elsa's?" "Oh, yethir," replied Dorothy, promptly. "I had a lovely time." "Well—well, and what did you do?" pursued the minister. "Oh, I went to the loveliest Thunday-thchool! The music played, the shade went up, and all the girlish danced!"

A colored preacher in Alabama had at one time served a short jail sentence and was fearful lest his congregation discover the fact, as in his later years he had been a model of rectitude. One Sunday, rising to begin his sermon, his heart sank to see a former cellmate sitting in the front row. Quick thinking was necessary. Fixing his eye on the unwelcome guest, the preacher announced solemnly: "Ah takes mah text dis mo'nin' from de sixty-fo'th chaptah and fo' hundredth verse of de book of Job, which says: 'Dem as sees and knows me, and says nothin', dem will Ah see later.'"

E. W. Howe of Kansas has been something of a traveler. He made a number of trips abroad and went twice around the world. It was on his first trip abroad that he encountered one of the sea hounds whose chief boast is concerned with the number of times they have crossed the Atlantic. Mr. Howe tells the incident as his favorite story. "Is this your first trip?" the sea hound asked Mr. Howe on the occasion of their first meeting. Mr. Howe admitted that it was. "Well," said the sea hound, "I've crossed the Atlantic forty times." On the second day the sea hound again put the question to Mr. Howe and again vouchsafed the same observation. He repeated it at frequent intervals during the trip. It was on the sixth day, after the sea hound had again spoken of the total number of his crossings, that Mr. Howe said to him: "By the way, have you ever been to Omaha?" The sea hound said he never had. "Well," retorted Mr. Howe, "I go there every week."

An old darky called Uncle Eb made his living by doing odd jobs. He could neither read nor write, and had the reputation of being extremely cautious in all his business dealings. One day he was employed by Mr. C to do some work about his place, and when the work was finished Mr. C handed him his money. As Uncle Eb took the money he said: "Mr. C, would yo' mind givin' me a receipt fo' dis money?" Mr. C indulgently wrote: "I have this day paid Uncle Eb two dollars," dated and signed it. The old darky watched him carefully, and as he took the receipt said: "Mr. C, is yo' sure dis am yo' own handwritin'?"

The wife of the great botanist beamed at him across the supper-table. "But these," she exclaimed, pointing to the dish of mushrooms that had been set before her, "are not all for me, Aristotle, are they?" "Yes, Mabel," he nodded. "I gathered them especially for you with my own hands." She beamed upon him gratefully. What a dear, unselfish husband he was! In five minutes she had demolished the lot. At breakfast the next morning he greeted her anxiously. "Sleep all right?" he inquired. "Splendidly," she smiled. "Not sick at all—no pains?" he pressed. "Why, of course not, Aristotle," she responded. "Hurrah!" he then exclaimed. "I have discovered another species of mushroom that isn't poisonous."

"Please, sir," piped the tiny customer, whose head scarcely reached the counter, "father wants some oak varnish." "How much does your father want, my little man?" asked the shopman. "Father said you was to fill this," said the little fellow, handing over a half-gallon can. It was duly filled, and handed over. "Father will pay you on Saturday," said the recipient casually. And the face of the shopman grew dark. "We don't give credit here," he said. "Gimme back the can!" Meekly the little lad handed back the can, which was emptied and given to him with a scowl. "Thank you, sir," he said. "Father said you'd be sure to leave enough round the sides for him to finish the job he wants to do. And I think you have, sir."

Two darky boys in a Southern city met on the street, each wearing a new suit. One asked: "Nigger, how much do they set you back for dem clo's?" "Fo'ty dollahs," was the response. "Fo'ty dollahs?" "Yes, sah; fo'ty dollahs." "Look at me," said the first. "I've got on a suit w'at's mos' perzactly like yourn, and I don't pay but ten dollahs fuh mine. Somebody shore fimflammed you." The possessor of the forty-dollar suit took hold of one of the coat sleeves of the ten-dollar suit and pulled on it. It stretched. Then straightening up he said: "See here, boy, the fust big rain yo' gets ketched out in dat coat of yourn is gwine to say, 'Good-by, nigger, f'om now on I'se gwine to be yo' vest.'"

Because I Feed Him.

Beside me lived a family who called themselves my friends—
The son, the wife, the husband—and the dog.
Whene'er my home life went amiss, these neighbors made amends;
We grew as thick as raindrops in a fog.

But now I gaze upon the hostile windows of their home;
The son, the wife, the husband pass me by;
For Fortune is a fickle jade and ever wont to roam—
And favors given must be returned—or die.

So ended friendship's too rank growth with neighbors by my side;
The lesson I will keep in memory's log:
But one of all that family with me is still allied—
And that's the poor old mongrel of a dog!

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

Cycol will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexecon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of Cycol as shown on the Cycol Recommendation Chart. Use Associated gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

A paper chase at Pebble Beach in February and a gymkana and horse show at the polo fields during the course of the spring polo tournament will be other attractive affairs.

The subscribers, as well as those interested in the single event, are planning parties of their friends for the concert, which is creating more than a ripple in the social and musical life of this city.

At a conference in London on the problems of domestic service it was suggested that there should be a degree for domestic service, carrying the same social value as the women's degrees at Newnham and Girton, and that every schoolgirl should be required to sit for an examination in housewifery.

THE TOMB OF COLUMBUS.

The renewal of the undertaking to erect a lofty mausoleum and pharos "over the remains of Christopher Columbus in Santo Domingo" raises the much-disputed question of the actual whereabouts of those remains (says the New York Tribune). There are those who insist that they still rest in Santo Domingo, where they were laid in 1542. There are probably many more who believe them to be in the Cathedral of Seville, in Spain.

These are the known facts: In 1542 the colony of Hispaniola, now Santo Domingo and Hayti, asked for the return of Columbus' body, and Charles I accordingly had it, with that of Christopher's son, Diego, exhumed at Seville and sent thither, and they were placed in adjacent tombs beneath the sanctuary of the Cathedral of Santo Domingo. There the two bodies lay for two and a half centuries undisturbed and, indeed, neglected. In 1783 Moreau de Saint-Mery made inquiry concerning the tombs, and found that the cathedral had been so remodeled that it was difficult to tell just where they were and which was which. In 1795 the island was transferred to French sovereignty, and the Spanish governor on withdrawing got permission to remove the remains of Columbus to Havana, Cuba, and the following year he did thus remove and had interred in the Cathedral of Havana what he and all others believed to be the coffin containing the dust of the great discoverer.

No question was raised concerning this until 1887, when extensive repairs were made to the Cathedral of Santo Domingo, in the course of which there was unearthed a leaden casket bearing an inscription which, when amplified from its abbreviated form, was said to read: "Discoverer of America: First Admiral." The President of Santo Domingo, various foreign diplomats, and other dignitaries were summoned, and in their presence the casket was opened. On the inner side of the lid was found an inscription which was interpreted as reading: "Illustrious and Noble Man, Don Cristoval Colon." Thereupon and thereafter the Dominicans insisted that the dust of the discoverer was in their possession.

The Cuban authorities and the Spanish government made an elaborate investigation, and secured at least a comparable array of authorities on their side, headed by Señor Columbus of the Spanish Royal Academy of History, whose report was generally accepted as conclusive everywhere save in Santo Domingo. So at last, in 1899, Spain, on relinquishing the "Pearl of the Antilles," took back to a tomb in the Cathedral of Seville the casket which had been taken from Santo Domingo to Havana, believing that it contained the mortal remains of Christopher Columbus.

It is improbable that the uncertainty will ever be entirely dispelled. But even if it is not, and even if most people believe that the dust of the admiral rests at Seville, it will not be unfitting to erect a memorial in what was Clemenceau's Autobiography.

The Echo de Paris publishes an account by Marcel Hutin of a visit paid to M. Clemenceau on the occasion of Armistice Day in the celebrated little flat in the Rue Franklin, where the ex-premier is again living. Although, as always, refusing to give anything in the nature of an interview, M. Clemenceau nevertheless discussed many subjects freely, but on the express understanding that the conversation should be unpublished.

"Like Charles the Fifth, I've seen my own funeral," said he, with a laugh.

M. Hutin, however, says he is able to state that the aged statesman is busily engaged in an important literary work in which he will embody all the vast experience of his long life. He expects to be engaged in this undertaking for about three more years.

The work will be published only if he is able to conclude it to his own satisfaction. He has put a special clause in his will to the effect that the manuscript must be burned should he die before being able to finish it.

M. Clemenceau was emphatic in saying that the work must in no way be regarded as being anything in the way of memoirs. Never, he said, during the period in which he was in power had he kept any important documents nor even made any notes. Therefore he relies solely on his memory.

Meanwhile he has no intention of stepping forth to defend himself against the violent attacks of a section of the press and a number of politicians who blame him because France is not entirely satisfied with the results of the peace treaty, for which M. Clemenceau is held mainly responsible.

He has left public life forever, according to M. Hutin, and intends to end his days dividing his time between his Paris home and his native Vendée.

Most superstitions veil their birth in vague antiquity. Admittedly the opal is one of the most beautiful of semi-precious stones. Its variegated colors have no equal and some of the well-cut stones take high rank in fine world collections. And yet the opal is called unlucky. A lapidary who bears an excellent reputation at his craft, and who has made a study of stones and their attendant legends, lays the unlucky opal superstition at the door of the stone-cutters themselves. An opal in matrix is a difficult thing to handle. The crude stone comes imbedded in hard rock and their form is fragmentary and odd. Under old-time shop rules workmen were forced to stand a portion of the losses through breakage of materials. In this manner, as the opal presented many chances for loss, the opal made many enemies.

The American Academy.

Marshal Foch, with a fame already immortal, comes doubly an "Immortal," as a member of the French Academy, to lay the cornerstone of the home of a New World Academy (says the New York Times). This institution has a membership of fifty, elected out of 250 representative men of letters, art, and music who constitute the National Institute of Arts and Letters—fifty less three, for there are three vacancies caused by the recent death of John Burroughs, Abbot Thayer, and Barrett Wendell. Young as it is, with a national charter from Congress that does not go back even to the beginning of the war, it has full fifty among its dead. And an illustrious list it is, with such names upon it as Howells (the first president of the academy), Saint-Gaudens, La Farge, Clemens, John Hay, Henry James, Roosevelt, Aldrich, Joseph Jefferson, Gilder, Schurz, Mahan, Edward Everett Hale, Julia Ward Howe, Moody, Riley, and others not less deserving of mention. It were invidious to name less than all of the living members who carry on the worthily established tradition of the academy, though with such highly individual and distinctive achievement as to defend this self-perpetuating company—recruited from the institute as death takes from the academy—from the danger which besets such bodies of "becoming the haven of correct mediocrity." Its object is very broadly stated to be the "protection and furtherance of literature and the fine arts, but it might be more definitively expressed in the purpose of the French Academy—that of preserving standards of speech—if extended to all the arts of expression. Particularly is the existence of such a body needful in a democracy and in a land of free speech. The government maintains standards for measuring the things we eat, drink, and wear, the acres we live on and the light we burn. A false weight is an "abomination" to organized society. But there is and can be no accurate measure prescribed or enforced for giving or receiving those intangible things of the mind's exchange or the spirit's commerce. Such a body as the Academy of Arts and Letters is an agency helpful to democracy, which recognized it, in holding fast to that which is good while proving all things. The National Academy in America should be proud to be "brigaded" in such a cause with the French Academy, under the unified command of this particular Immortal.

"Many Men—Many Minds."

In the record of notable deaths within the week we have a striking reminder of the familiar saw that it takes many men of many minds to make a world. Of such variety are the interests of civilized humanity, so different are the needs, not alone of different peoples, but of varying moods of the individuals who make up any people, as to afford scope for varied and contrasting talents and a field wide as the realm of ideas—we almost said of imagination.

Most notable of the deaths of the week is that of the Pope (Benedict XV), the spiritual father of unnumbered millions of men and women throughout the world. The influence of the head of the Catholic Church extends to every country and every province of the globe. Not all countries, to be sure, hearken to the spiritual guidance of Rome, but there is no country in which devoted adherents of the Roman church may not be found and to which its influence does not extend in one degree or another.

Measured by the higher standards of pontifical character and of intellectual power, Benedict XV was not a great Pope. That he was a man of high individual character, of high attainments, of high aims, goes without saying—in these days elevation to the papacy of any man lacking these qualifications is not thinkable. That it was not always so, history bears witness, as the whole world knows; and the moral contrast between Popes of this age and of other ages now happily remote bears witness to the advance of the moral standards of modern social organization as compared with those of former times.

The supreme enthusiasm of Benedict XV, aside from his deeply religious character and his devotion to the organization of which he was the head, was for peace among the nations. Curiously enough, it was the fate of this modern apostle of peace to reign over the Church Universal in the period of a war of unprecedented magnitude, involving unprecedented associations of nations and marked by barbarities hardly matched within the Christian era. It was no fault of his that his efforts to alleviate the horrors of war came to naught in an immediate sense; nor in any sense is it an indictment of the man or the pontiff that the fruition of his ideas and projects must wait upon future times. Nor may it be assumed that the lessons which he sought to teach are lost to the race. The ideals that he preached, the standards that he urged, make a record not to be regarded lightly, since they are bound to stand as precedents for the instruction of those who are to come after him in the administration of the Catholic Church, and as a source of inspiration for all lovers and promoters of peace now and in times to come.

During the war Benedict XV made two notable attempts to bring the conflict to a halt, but the momentum was too great for spiritual control. Furthermore, there was on the part of the Allied nations very general feeling that the sympathies of Benedict, though not openly revealed, were with the cause of the German autocracy, and this conception, whether justified or not, was sufficient to nullify his efforts. More recently and more successfully the influence of the Vatican and of Benedict XV were exercised in the cause of peace in Ireland. Here, perhaps—unquestionably, we think—is the most imposing monument to his memory. Truly it may be said of the dead pontiff that a man of high moral enthusiasm, a personality of conspicuous worthiness, a vital spiritual force has gone out of the world. Under his hand the best traditions of the papacy were sustained. Men of all faiths unite, and worthily so, in tribute to the man, his worth, and his work.

A man of another type, a man whose talents and propensities lay in other courses, a man of high powers and of noble record in the cause of civilization, was James Bryce, dead at the age of eighty-three. Mr. Bryce—Lord Bryce in the roster of British notability—was a large figure in the limited group of what may be styled "world men." Briton he was to the core of him, but none the less a citizen of the wide world. His interests and his sympathies were universal; and they were matched by a comprehension that visualized men and things in their true proportions unbiased by any limitation of national or racial boundaries. It was given to Mr. Bryce (we say Mr. Bryce because to the end of his days he held the style of a commoner) to serve in large spheres. Among his immediate countrymen no man excelled him in knowledge of world affairs or in the clarity of judgments which were ever soundly founded and humanely inspired. He was singularly an intellectual man, but his work was by no means limited to interests merely intellectual. A man of mind, he was also a man of action. As a journalist, as a counselor of cabinets, as an administrator, as an ambassador, he wrought with industry, with judgment, with success. Withal there was in the man, in all his goings and his comings, in all his ways of life, the kind of simplicity that is a mark of loftiest character.

America had for Mr. Bryce a special affection and owed to him a large obligation. No man did more, perhaps none did so much, to press upon our own people the significance and worth of our own institutions as did Mr. Bryce. His great work, "The American Commonwealth," designed to explain America to the non-American world, became and continues to be the soundest text-book of American ideals and American institutions. Supplemental to this noble contribution to the intelligence of the world, and especially to the intelligence of the American people concerning their own institutions, Mr. Bryce, in his service at Washington, planted seeds now bearing fruit in a more sympathetic relationship between his country and our own. It is perhaps not too much to say that that which has recently been achieved in the way of British and American coordination at the Washington Conference is in direct sequel to the work of James Bryce.

But it was not alone the English-speaking world that gained benefit from the wisdom and humane solicitude of this truly great man. Wherever Mr. Bryce went—and he went everywhere—he radiated the light of a large and beneficent mind, contributing that which in time present and times to come shall aid in the guidance of men toward better aims and achievements.

From the spheres in which Pope Benedict XV and James Bryce lived and worked it is a far cry to that which engaged the interest and the energies of John Kendrick Bangs, the widely-known journalist and humorist. To many it may appear an incongruous descent. Yet is it so in truth? What would the world be without laughter? Is not a man whose imagination, always exercised in sweet and cleanly ways, brought surcease from care and rest to weariness, entitled to be named with those who make contribution to the essential values of human life? Of such assuredly was John Kendrick Bangs. Too often the fun-maker is lost in the buffoon. Too often he descends to effects through sacrifice of dignity, far too often he is merely sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal. Not so with Bangs. The basis of the man was nobility of character. The play of his mind never passed the boundary that divides nonsense from sense, never got beyond the restraints of refinement, never made light of fundamental moralities. Truly a fellow of infinite jest was John Kendrick Bangs. But the most serious mind, the most delicately minded, the most morally sensitive, never found in anything that came from his pen that which might be wished to have been unsaid. Not for a moment do we classify this amiable, this brilliant, this altogether worthy inspirer of laughter with the great doers and thinkers whose thinking and doing mold the broader lines of human life. But surely neither the Pope on his throne nor Mr. Bryce in his study would have been the less worthy for association with John Kendrick Bangs.

Why the Conference Waits.

From the great calm that appears to have settled down upon the Conference at Washington there emerges suggestions explanatory of that which at long range has looked like unreasonable delay in the matter of adjournment. Having gone through with the business more particularly related to Europe, the delegates representing European countries are anxious to go home. Likewise, the Japanese delegates would like to quit. But Messrs. Hughes, Root, Lodge, and Underwood, representing the United States, are determined that adjournment will not come until definite adjustment has been reached with respect to the relations of China and Japan. They insist that there shall be no ambiguities in the commitments relative to China and Japan and they are forcing the issue by the method of sitting and waiting for Japan to come to terms. Herein they count upon pressure upon Japan from European delegates whose interest now is the double one of confirming what has been achieved in their own interest and of getting home.

Removal of the European questions from the Conference left the air clear for adjustment of the issues related to the Pacific world. It was at this point that the Japanese made an effort to stampede the Conference into early adjournment, leaving such matters Shantung, the Twenty-One Demands, "spheres of influence," and Siberia undetermined. The proposal in effect was that kind words should be uttered on these subjects, but that no affirmative action should be taken. It would be assuming a good deal to say that the American delegation put impediments in the way of finally closing up the subjects upon which substantial agreements had been made. However this may be, impediments appeared. Then came announcement that none of the treaties or agreements would be sent to the United States Senate until all went. In other words, nothing should be regarded as completed until all was completed. The American delegates did not plead exigencies of domestic political conditions as previously did M. Briand and others. In fact, they made no plea at all. No plea was necessary with Senator Borah emitting shrieks of horror and amazement at the Four-Power treaty and with Senator Johnson announcing that California and the Pacific Coast regarded the treaty with suspicion. The visiting delegates put two and two together, with the result that there came to them realization that they will get nothing out of this Conference until the Senate shall give its approval.

Patiently and philosophically the American delegation has sat quietly permitting the visitors to come to understanding that the Conference can not get away from Washington until it has done something substantial in the matter of Pacific adjustments—something more than emission of soothing phrases as related to Far East problems. They are giving to the Conference, more particularly to the Oriental delegates, some new points in the art of patience as applied to diplomacy. It is not to be expected that all questions are to be adjusted. It is insisted, however, that an honest effort shall be made for definite settlements and that such settlements must go as far as conditions in China and Siberia will permit.

A Coming Event.

It will help to appreciation of the significance of the coming convention of Shriners in this city in June to know something of the history and character of this famous order. The Shrine is not so much a Masonic institution as an association of Masons representative of the highest degrees of that order. In a sense the Shrine is the aristocratic element of Masonry. The circumstances of its organization are interesting. Something more than fifty years ago Mr. W. J. Florence, a famous actor, whose name will recall pleasant memories to elders of this generation, made an extended journey in the Orient. Witnessing in various countries the elaboration of Oriental life in its holiday-making, and being himself a Mason of high degree, he conceived the idea of an order allied with Masonry that would illustrate its lighter spirit. Upon this conception, and under the personal inspiration of Mr. Florence, the "Ancient Arabic Order of Nobles of the Mystic Shrine" was organized fifty years ago. The coming event is to be the semi-centennial of that organization.

After a few years of rather purposeless playing about there came to the leaders of the movement the idea of employing the order upon charitable account. Further consideration has led recently to employment of the energies—and funds—of the order to the care of crippled children. Not only the children of Masons, but children of all races, conditions, and kinds are to have the benefit of the solicitude and help of the order. Those whose parents are able to pay are required to make contribution to the fund, but none are excluded because of poverty. In truth, the especial solicitude of the order is for those who are not able to pay. Under this policy institutions for the care of crippled children have been established in various cities of the country, San Francisco being on the list. A site in the Sunset District has been secured and plans are now under way for erection of a hospital to be devoted especially to crippled children. It is hoped that the hospital may be ready for acceptance and occupancy at the date of the meeting here—this coming June. The support of this institution and others similarly founded is to be at the hands of the order, the funds being supplied by a special annual assessment of the members, now upwards of half a million in number.

It is estimated by those who have taken upon themselves the local arrangements that not less than 250,000 visitors will come to San Francisco for this event. Already three large steamers have been booked to bring the Atlantic contingent by way of the Canal to San Francisco. Arrangements have been made for special rates with accommodations for many thousands. Several caravans of motor parties are booked for the transcontinental journey. The Coast, naturally, will be represented by many thousand members of the order and their families. Probably not in her whole history will San Francisco have seen such an assemblage as we shall have here in June. Once before—twenty years ago—a convention of the Shrine was held in San Francisco, and all whose memory goes back to that event will recall its popularity and its many distinctions.

Local arrangements are being made upon an elaborate scale. The Auditorium has been secured for the sessions of the order, which are expected to continue through the better part of the week. Among the arrangements is a plan for three parades which can not fail of extraordinary brilliancy, due to the brilliant costuming incidental to such events and to the presence of a hundred or more "patrols" and bands of music to be brought by the visitors. Arrangements for entertainment are on the most elaborate scale. The programme includes events illustrating, not only the present life of California, but its traditional and historic interests, represented by rodeos, '49 camps, barbecues, etc.

It is expected that many of the visitors will wish to visit points of interest in the state, and to this end arrangements have been made for excursions, including Yosemite, Big Trees, Lake Tahoe, and the southern counties. An especially attractive excursion open to visitors will be a trip to the Hawaiian Islands, for which six steamers have already been engaged, others to be added to the fleet if opportunities for chartering shall be available.

As the magnitude of the coming event has become manifest it has become necessary to make it a civic movement. To this end, under the auspices of the city government, the Chamber of Commerce, and other civic bodies, there has been formed a citizens' committee of one hundred and fifty members, representative of all elements of the community. This committee is now at work, and no detail that may tend to the distinction of the occasion or of the welfare of visitors will be lacking. It is appreciated that the coming of so many visitors, all of them persons of representative character, can not fail of advantage to San Francisco and to California. One assurance, already certified by the committee of management, is that San Francisco will provide comfortable housing for all who may come. A further assurance is that hotel rates and other charges will be maintained at normal basis.

The Bonus.

It is gravely urged that the government can pay out anywhere from three to five billion dollars in bonuses without it costing anybody anything. The basis of this argument bears close relationship to the idea that a man may lift himself by his boot-straps. If the bounty shall be paid—and this now seems an assurance in respect to the coming congressional election—it will increase the bill of every man who pays taxes by at least 10 per cent. Indirectly it will add to the cost of living and thus finger the pockets of those who fondly imagine that they pay no taxes. There is no way by which a great sum of money can be paid out unless somebody pays it in. The bonus project is purely one of politics; in a sense it is a two-edged sword. If the "veterans" are not given their petty little bribe they are likely so their leaders tell us—to vote for the opposition ticket. But how about the taxpayers? Is there not likely to be a revolt on the part of those who have to provide the money for this politically-inspired, unnecessary, mischievous, vicious proposal?

Editorial Notes.

Somebody has said of the work of the Young Women's Christian Association of San Francisco that it is "intensively practical and tremendously worth while." It is not a charity in the sense that that term is applied to the salvage of human wreckage. Nor is it a charity in the sense that its methods are comparable with those of ordinary charitable organizations. Its special merit lies in what we may term constructive humanitarianism. It deals with life in its hopeful aspects. It helps young women to help themselves. Seven centres are maintained by the association in this city. It exercises a moral oversight over many outside rooms where girls can maintain themselves in homelike atmospheres. It sustains a woman's hotel which during the past year entertained 1895 guests. It provided last year in its Sutter Street cafeteria 203,127 meals. In its Post Street cafeteria it served 191,320 lunches at practical cost. At its box luncheon centre there were 37,390 services of soup or chocolate at a nominal cost of 5 cents each. It has within the year entertained 576 girls at its Mill Valley camp at a cost of 20 cents each per night. At its Mission centre alone more than 7000 girls enjoyed its privileges last year, and at the several other centres many thousand each. At the Y. W. C. A. gymnasium at 620 Sutter Street athletic classes of various kinds are maintained at nominal cost. Gymnasium work is based upon physical and mental examination, which is in itself a boon to many a young woman, giving them aid and counsel of the highest value and which otherwise they might not enjoy. The salt water swimming pool at the gymnasium is available to girls at merely nominal rates.

This fine institution is in large part maintained by fees, partly by donations. It is estimated that for the coming year it will disburse $328,324; the year's receipts are estimated at $252,324. The association now has in its various funds $34,666. The deficit in prospect, including an estimate of $4000 for campaign expenses, will approximately be $80,000. The association asks the people of San Francisco to provide this sum by direct donation. Compared with the magnitude of the work and as related to its beneficent purpose, the amount required is trivial. Does anybody know of any better way to use money than to aid self-respecting young women to help themselves? It is not invidious to characterize this work as the most constructive of any in the local field of humanitarian enterprise. It should appeal to every generous-minded person. Especially it should appeal to fathers and mothers, even though it should take a little from the luxury of their own homes. It is worth while to give where the moral yield is so important and so assured.

Rudolph Taussig was a man of highly moral type. A practical man of business, in which he was notably successful, the inspiring motive of his life was that of humanitarian sentiment. Whatever in the way of social or political purposes seemed to him good, commanded his devoted support. And with Rudolph Taussig, support meant more than words. He was a worker; what is more, he wrought as diligently in matters relating to public welfare as in matters calculated to yield individual profit. In brief, Rudolph Taussig was a fine man and a truly worthy citizen.

Other Times, Other Manners!

ROCKLIN, CAL., January 18, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR:—Sir: Ray Stannard Baker, who is the author of Woodrow Wilson's apologia pro vita sua at Paris, states in his introduction that in December, 1920, the then President wrote to him:

"It is clear to me that it will not be possible for me to write anything such as you suggest, but I believe that you could do it admirably. * * * I have a trunk full of papers, and the next time you are down here I would like to have you go through them and see what they are and what the best use is that can be made of them. I plunked them into the trunk in Paris and have not had the time or physical energy even to sort or arrange them. I am looking forward with great satisfaction to the work you are proposing to do."

These papers, Mr. Baker explains, were accumulated as follows:

"President Wilson kept on his desk at Paris, during the Peace Conference, a large steel document box, with a spring lock. I have seen him at the close of the day, after the session of the Council of Four, 'methodically put into this box all the papers and memoranda which had come to him in the course of the day's proceedings. From time to time, as the box filled up, and the documents were no longer required, they were removed to larger boxes and trunks, one of them beautifully made by the ship's carpenter of the George Washington. All of these were brought home with him to the White House."

Mr. Baker then details the contents of the various trunks and boxes, which according to his testimony consisted in part—in large part—of original documents accumulated by Mr. Wilson as the official head of the commission representing the United States at the Paris Peace Conference.

Mr. Wilson himself defined his position at Paris in signing the treaty at Versailles as "the President of the United States by the Honourable Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, acting in his own name and by his own proper authority."

From the character of these papers and the manner and method by which they are being made public a double-barreled question seems to arise.

First—Today to whom do such of these papers as are both original and official belong, for today Mr. Wilson is no longer official.

The second part of the question involves both the ethics and the right to put them to use in partisan explanation and defense of what was an official act, if access to them is to be confined to their possessor.

The answer to this part of the question can be found both in historical analogy and in precedent—that became presidential precedent.

The understood reason for Mr. Baker's contribution is the claim that Mr. Wilson has been unfairly treated and his aims and accomplishments at Paris misunderstood and misrepresented.

The cabals and constant distortion and misrepresentation that accompanied his every act were not the least of Washington's revolutionary troubles. John Jay, the first Chief Justice, told his son that in the Continental Congress "from first to last there was a most bitter party against him" (Washington).

In spite of this, however, Washington Irving states that after the peace "applications began to be made to him by persons desirous of writing the history of the revolution for access to the public papers in his possession. He excused himself from submitting to their inspection those relative to the occurrences and transaction of his late command until Congress should see fit to open their archives to the historian."

"Other times, other manners."

From a Peeved—and Obviously Very Young—"Veteran."

MANKATO, MINNESOTA, January 18, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: Once before I wrote you a very sincere expression of what I believed was the average ex-soldier's opinion as regards the Adjusted Compensation bill, the passage of which you seem to so thoroughly lament. Either everything is going all wrong at Washington or else you are all wrong.

In two instances now you have aligned yourself against a nation-wide movement and lost out. I refer to the Maternity bill and the Adjusted Compensation bill. The one has already become the law of the land and the other is about to be.

Now to return to the Adjusted Compensation bill, you certainly place yourself in a very bad way. If the returned soldier is to be helped, help him now when he needs it and the chances are he will not need any pension aid in his old age. Deny him the help now and what per cent. will there be living to receive pension aid? You actually get downright insulting in your editorial of January 14th, when you openly charge every ex-soldier with receiving graft money if he accepts adjusted compensation. An Athenian once said, "If I am dishonest I am not worth a bribe, if honest you surely must know I will not take one." Can a man receive a bribe from himself? The American Legion is directly responsible for securing to the ex-soldier the passage of the Adjusted Compensation bill. They have had to fight tooth and nail for its passage; resurrecting it out of pigeon-holes and nursing it after receiving a misguided slap in the face by our own dear President. The whole outfit at Washington has had to be shamed into supporting the Adjusted Compensation bill, and now you have the ill manners to say that they are buying votes for next summer's election. Can you bribe a man by offering him his own wealth, something he has worked for himself to possess, and does possess?

The Soldiers' Adjusted Compensation bill is not near the iniquitous thing that you make it out to be. It does not put a monetary value on patriotic service. It is not a bonus; it is adjusted compensation.

I wish I could say something that would put this thing over to convince you that you are wrong. It is the most remarkable case of misplaced judgment that has ever come to my attention. Think of saying that it was a burden to buy Liberty Bonds, or to buy things at war prices. Were you not also receiving war wages? Every one at home was enjoying prosperity undreamed of before. The real burden came after the war to take up the problem of reconstruction, and who will deny me when I say that the ex-soldier has had to accept the big end of the stick, and it is for this that he asks adjusted compensation. Had those back home saved for the fellow who went into the service the job that they promised him when he went away the chances are that you would never have heard anything about the Adjusted Compensation bill. But they thought that they were safe in promising anything, that the chances were slim that he who went away would ever return again. And then to crown it all the Argonaut would belittle every man that went across that did not get shot and stay there.

Readers of the Argonaut, do you not think the motion is in order to demand an apology for so great a slander, so great an injustice to the fellow who gave his all? I for one shall expect it.

I thank you one and all. I hope I may be with you in the future, as I have always enjoyed the Argonaut.

Very truly,
GEORGE SWANSON,
Member Lorentz Post No. 11.

Light on the Newberry Case.

SAN FRANCISCO, January 24, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: In your recent editorial relative to the Newberry case I think you overlooked mentioning one or two things that should be taken into consideration in connection with the expenditures made by Senator Newberry's friends. If I am not mistaken, Henry Ford said he was asked by Woodrow Wilson to become a candidate for United States senator and was promised the support of the administration to secure his election. Mr. Wilson kept his promise to Ford by sending into Michigan a large number of Democratic politicians and office-holders to campaign for Ford.

Several members of the Cabinet made speeches in Michigan in Henry Ford's behalf. Woodrow Wilson left no stone unturned and made the utmost efforts to have Ford elected by sending Federal office-holders drawing their salary and expenses from the government, and thus were being paid by the Federal government to campaign for Henry Ford. These friends of Newberry realized that this tremendous influence exerted, with these great political advantages, would seriously handicap Senator Newberry in his campaign unless his friends met the issue with equal expenditures.

Not having a President of the United States and United States officials drawing their salary from the United States government to campaign in Newberry's behalf, the only way they could get equal publicity was to advertise very extensively with the campaign funds provided by Senator Newberry's friends. If it was a crime for Senator Newberry's friends to meet the issue in this way, was it not an equal crime for the President of the United States to send his Cabinet and appointees at the expense of the government.

As to the reasons Mr. Wilson chose Henry Ford out of all the Michigan citizens as the most fit candidate to represent Michigan in the United States Senate, it certainly was not on account of Ford's wisdom or learning. Henry Ford only had one qualification as to being the "most available" and fit candidate, and that was his immense fortune. Mr. Wilson knew that Henry Ford was a large contributor to the campaign fund of the Democratic party, and thus while Ford could say he himself did not spend any money on his own candidacy, the Democratic party, to which he contributed, did, and Mr. Wilson also saw that his appointees and office-holders likewise worked in Ford's behalf while being paid with government funds.

Henry Ford has declared that he had no learning, that all "history is bunk," and in his libel suit admitted his monumental ignorance. Why was it that Mr. Wilson chose Henry Ford as the most "available candidate" to represent Michigan in the United States Senate. It is apparent even to a blind man.

Moreover, it should not be forgotten that in order to curry favor with Henry Ford Mr. Wilson personally exempted his son, Edsel Ford, from the draft. Was there any more reason why he should be exempted than any other man except that it was the immense influence of his father's fortune?

These things should not be forgotten or overlooked in considering the Newberry case. They all had an important and tremendous bearing, and Senator Newberry's friends realized what they had to contend with—the influence of a President and his entire official staff and appointees.

There has been no charge made of bribery or the improper expenditure of money—the charge was that of the excessive use of money for publicity and advertising. I think I have stated the facts fairly and which should be given due consideration before passing judgment.

S. M. THOMAS.

THE PENDULUM OF PROGRESS.

The election of a Pope has all the uncertainty of a presidential election, and all the ceremony of a coronation, which helps explain the world-wide interest Catholics and Protestants alike are showing in the choice of Benedict XV's successor. The selection has importance also with respect to the era of reconstruction on which the nations have entered, and much will depend on the character of the man chosen to direct the policy of the church through this period of general adjustment. But there is another reason, I think, for the particular notice the new papal election is receiving. It is the fact that the Pope is the only ruler who has emerged undiminished from the world war. The catastrophe that overturned so many thrones, and made a welter of so many faiths, has left the pontifical prestige, not only undimmed, but brighter than ever. Emperors in the past, laughing at papal remonstrances, have shorn and divided the temporal empire of the papacy till hardly a trace of it remains. The laugh is now on the emperors. One by one, the prisoner of the Vatican has watched their thrones totter and their power dwindle, and has seen the proudest of them driven to the indignity of reducing their household expenses in order to persuade their subjects that a king is "worth his keep." Compare the attenuated retinue of King George of England with that of the papal monarch, the full tale of whose household is an heraldic volume in itself. It must indeed be a considerable intellectual task to remember all these officials in the order of their precedence, from the Palatine Cardinal to the Assistant Regent of the Apostolic Hot Houses, and the Police Delegate. The vast list of employees includes four military corps. Among these is the Swiss Guard, which has a quaint custom of packing up and pretending to go home, on the death of one sovereign pontiff, until it is assured of pay under his successor. But there is no question here as to the feasibility of retaining these or any other members of the monarchical suite. The exiled emperors must be contemplating with mixed emotions the security of this ruler, whose absolute monarchy is the only surviving system of that kind in the Western world. Undoubtedly he owes his security in a large degree to the loss of his temporal empire, and to his liberation from the disputes that accompanied it. It is a curious commentary on the doctrine of force.

Those who are not familiar with the method of the Pope's election may find these facts of interest. The electoral college of Cardinals includes all the Cardinals present in Rome on the day when the conclave begins. The Cardinals are appointed by the Pope, and are chosen among all nations. France and Spain usually have six, and other countries more or less according to circumstances and their Catholic population. Just prior to Benedict XV's election thirty-four of the Cardinals were Italian and thirty foreign.

The Pope elected need not be a Cardinal, nor an Italian, though he is usually both. Five men beneath the Cardinal rank have held the papal office. Five Popes have been Frenchmen, one an Englishman, two have been Germans, and one Portuguese. But all this was before the fifteenth century.

The Rt. Rev. Edmond Canon Hugues de Pagnan gives this explanation of the various processes of election:

The election is effected either by inspiration, when, upon the nomination of a candidate, all the electors accept him by acclamation, or by compromise, when the conclave unanimously entrusts to a committee composed of an uneven number of members the duty of nominating the Pope by a majority of votes, or by ballots, which is the usual method. In this case the conclave votes twice each day by secret ballot until one candidate has obtained two-thirds of the entire number of votes. As soon as the Pope-elect has recognized his election he becomes the Sovereign Pontiff. He receives the pallium and crown and takes solemn possession of the Lateran Church.

The French have a proverb: "Plus ça change, plus c'est la même chose," meaning that the more things change the more they don't. This seems particularly true at present, when so many historical tendencies are coming full circle. The warrior of today is returning with new weapons to primitive methods of warfare. Women seem to be reviving the antique sorceries, and an ancient kind of despotism. Old creeds reappear on the threshold of the mind, like cats long since drowned and forgotten, and the ends of progress and revolution appear to represent a mere return to the point we started from.

We may not see, yet a while, the fulfillment of Anatole France's fable of the Tower, which fifteen simple men started to build, and which rose tier on tier through successive generations, each story more complex than its predecessor, till in one of the crowded upper compartments some one discovered an explosive that could destroy the thing at one stroke, and did. But we need not be calamists to admit the possibility of such an event. It is a mark of how little the race in general cares about the social structure it has created that our strongest deterrent from anarchy is the fear of famine. A good many highly civilized Americans have been watching the Russian experiment in anarchy with a lively and hopeful interest, and are now regretting that hunger has prevented some of the principles from being carried to an illuminating conclusion. The developments thus far would justify almost any deduction, but perhaps the most obvious one is that the path of progress is a pendulum.

If the Harold Bell Wright of Russia (whoever he is) has not by this time been massacred by the Soviet, he is undoubtedly writing novels on the deplorable prevalence of marriage in that land of topsy turvy.

The peculiar facts are these. It costs 20 cents to get married in Russia, and 15 cents to be divorced. Both processes are as simple as signing a railway ticket, though the difference of 5 cents in the cost of the marriage certificate is a serious consideration under present financial conditions. On the other hand, in getting married one is presented by the state with free furniture and a trousseau. Since this gift is worth at least 40 cents, the nuptial bond is robbed of all pecuniary risk. After an interval short or long, as the contracting parties prefer, it can be dissolved again, without difficulty, and even with a respectable margin of profit.

A number of astute young Russians, who have not yet forgotten the sinful art of arithmetic as taught them in the old imperial school, have been quick to see the commercial possibilities in this margin. Why not, for example, get married, sell the furniture and trousseau, buy a divorce with the proceeds, start a business with the remaining 5 cents, remarry, acquire more furniture and so ad infinitum, or at least as long as one is capable of fulfilling the purpose envisaged by the state.

The unmarried mothers of Russia gaze on this sordid spectacle with a sense of outraged decency. They are thinking, no doubt, of the effect of all this on the children, and pitying the young innocents who will have to carry through life the stigma of lawful wedlock. What is the country coming to, and where will it all end, they wonder.

The only check on the matrimonial orgy is that the unmarried mothers are more generously provided for by the state than the married. While this safeguard continues, the integrity of home life is assured. But the menace, they say, will not be averted till the more sober elements in society take a firm stand against the marriage evil, and insist that the sanctity of unlegalized union be no longer travestied in this soulless fashion.

Consider now a French pendulum. The town of Tulle, France, having been visited by a flood of poison letters from an unknown hand, the examining magistrate has called in a Parisian clairvoyant and mesmerist to trace them to their source. Should he fail to locate the criminal by this necromantic means, the judge may resort to a magic pendulum, which when suspended above the head of a suspect or witness will indicate by a luminous spot in his temple whether or not he is a liar.

In years past, people who entertained such notions were burned as witches. The punishment was severe, but not unreasonable. To adduce supernatural, or at least super-rational evidence against a human being suspected of an offense that involves his life or liberty hits at the foundations of civilized government. It is contrary to the most rudimentary principles of justice that any man should be judged on grounds that can not be proved to exist. Rather than admit so much as a trace of this suggestion into the processes of law, it would be better to exclude people with occult tendencies from all share in the judicial functions of the state, whether as judges, jurymen, or witnesses. It is a strange thought that France, which was the first country to exalt reason as the supreme head of government, should tolerate such a reversion to mediæval injustice.

But France is not alone in this. Our own examination of prisoners with "truth" machines, and other such fantasies of the psychologists, is a germ of the same culture. Like the species of mental torture involved in the third degree, it can not logically be differentiated from the "extraordinary questions" of the dark ages. Of these so-called psychological instruments for the testing of crime it need only be said that psychology itself is not conceded by investigators in the material provinces of knowledge to be a science, for the plain reason that its postulates and conclusions are incapable of proof. Grant the expert investigator in this field any degree of control over the administration of justice, and we return in that degree to the principles of the Inquisition. The authority they claim is the authority of dogma, and derives whatever sanction it possesses from the inability of the common man either to understand or refute it.

We lull ourselves in a republican Utopia if we conceive that the "ex-emperors" regard themselves as "ex." From among the grape vines of Madeira the exiled Charles sends a gracious address to his subjects, assuring them that after mature thought he has decided to retain the throne of only one of the nations in the dual monarchy.

Writes "Kaiser Wilhelm II" from his palatial woodshed in Holland to the Junkers of Germany, "One must aim at the fathers of households in order to make of them household priests, who can lead on and instruct the people." The probable sentiment of the present fathers of households in Germany is that they have been quite sufficiently aimed at, for the time being. As to being led on, they have already been conducted to every conceivable form of ruin. And the phrase "household priests" opens up bewildering vistas of surmise. There would appear to be profounder strains of atavism in William than we had imagined. Wood-chopping seems to have made him a Druid. Perhaps he dreams of a sacrificial stone on which he could give Foch, Clemenceau, and Wilson "a place in the sun." Or, having failed in his temporal plan of world empire, does he think of reviving his right, as inheritor of the remains of the Holy Roman Empire, to build up a spiritual see? Wilhelm as an anti-Pope is a startling idea, but, after all, why not? It is the only pretension he could now advance without an anti-climax of absurdity, and the danger of a falling off in this respect seems to have been the nightmare of his career. But the letter can be interpreted quite as plausibly as the same old code stuff, the priests representing sergeants, captains, colonels, and so on, in a cipher universally clear to the German people, who have long since been taught to regard their armies as the battalions of God. As the German daily papers give evidence from time to time, a highly subsidized propaganda is once more throwing its fog into the wits of the German people. We have not yet heard the end of Wilhelm or his consecrated invisible army.

The production in London of August Strindberg's symbolical play, "Advent," is the occasion of the first appearance of Christ on the English stage. Hitherto the stage censor has prohibited such representations, with results that are instructive regarding the effects of censorship in general.

The chief effect of this prohibition has been to stimulate a number of playwrights to win a temporary applause by their ingenuity in evading the censor's ban. Some of them chose the resource of exhibiting Christ on the stage without naming Him, as, for instance, Jerome in the "Passing of the Third Floor Back." Others symbolized Him less directly. The Henry Arthur Jones school of playwrights in particular showed a puerile and profane but remarkable industry in the devices, mostly mechanical, with which they introduced the religious allusion. Instance their frequent use of the Cross, represented in shadows or accidental lights at moral crises in a play. To Americans "The Miracle" and "The Devil" afford familiar illustrations of a very similar thing. It is questionable whether these symbols would ever have been popular save for the narrow margin by which they escaped censorship. The temptation to defy a restriction of the same kind betrayed Pinero into a vulgarity that spoiled a good play, when he caused one of his heroines to throw a Bible into the fire. This gave his London audiences a sacred thrill of consternation very profitable to the author, but it is to be hoped that his artistic conscience suffered in proportion to the box-office receipts.

When one compares all this liturgical flam with the simple piety and understanding of the nobilities of art with which the Oberammergau peasants, witless of censorship, are preparing for the Passion Play this spring, the essential futility of a censor becomes apparent. Prohibitionists and censors of all kinds would do well to consider how innocently these people go about their unprohibited ways, and that with them even the execrated Rabelais had more in common than has any modern reformer. Were the censors to devote the time they now employ in perverting the artist, toward attempting to produce a work of art, they would be much better occupied, though the result, of course, would be a death blow to their pretensions.

The project, which was widely discussed before the war, of cutting a canal across Scotland from the Clyde to the Forth, is again under discussion. The existing small canal will probably be utilized by widening it to take ocean-going craft. The projected canal would cut eighteen hours off the journey by sea from London to Glasgow, and it would put Liverpool, Belfast, and Glasgow in direct touch with Holland, Germany, and Scandinavia. The canal would be seven years in construction and would cost approximately $150,000,000.

The name Paris as applied to the town first occurred in a synodal letter convening a council there in A. D. 360. The city is first mentioned in history under the name of Lutetia by Julius Caesar in 53 B. C., when he appointed it as the meeting place of deputies from conquered Gaul. It was then the fortified capital of the Parisii, an insignificant Gallic tribe.

Reflect that the chief source of all evils to man, and of baseness and cowardice, is not death, but the fear of death.—Epictetus.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Lois Weber is called America's most successful woman director and producer of photo plays. Her work is recognized by her profession generally.

Lady Cooper is England's newest candidate for Parliament. She stands for election on the Unionist ticket in succession to her husband, Sir Richard Cooper, M. P. for Walsall since 1910, who will not seek reelection.

The chief of this year's Mount Everest expedition is to be Brigadier-General the Hon. Charles Bruce, according to an announcement by the president of the Royal Geographical Society, Sir Francis Younghusband. General Bruce is secretary to the Glamorgan Territorial Association. He served with distinction at Burma, 1888; Hazura, 1891; Miranzai, 1891; Waziristan, 1894-95, and Tirah, 1897-98, when he was made a brevet major. He served throughout the European war as a brevet colonel, fought in the Afghan war in 1919, and retired in 1920. He is the author of "Twenty Years in the Himalayas" and "Kulu and Lahoul."

The Perkin Medal, awarded by the Society of Industrial Chemistry of Great Britain for the greatest contribution to the industry for the year, has been bestowed upon Dr. William M. Burton of Whiting, Indiana, inventor of the cracking process which has doubled the yield of gasoline from crude petroleum. In accepting the medal, presented at a meeting of the Chemists' Club of New York, Dr. Burton, who is connected with the Standard Oil Company of Indiana, declared that now about 2,000,000 gallons of cracked gasoline were being produced daily—about one-sixth of the country's total. Dr. Burton said that practical men at first had declined to help operate a still of 6000 gallons of oil under pressure, flaming all over the surface, because the cracking process required a temperature of 370 to 400 degrees centigrade, and the steel walls of the still would melt at 450.

Captain Roald Amundsen, the leader of the Norwegian polar expedition which reached the South Pole, is starting on a five-year route from Alaska to Norway. He is looking forward to his present exploration as the crowning achievement of his thirty years as an explorer—not excepting the discovery of the South Pole. Amundsen hopes to establish important data for weather forecasting on his new arctic sojourn. Roald Amundsen was born at Borge, Smaalene, fifty years ago, the son of a Norwegian shipowner. He studied medicine as a young man, but later went to sea. He was mate with the Belgica in 1897-99. In 1901 he was in the north on a tour of inspection of ice navigation. His first voyage with the Gjoa, hunting and making deep-water observations, took him to Greenland. The second Gjoa expedition was to the North Magnetic Pole and the Northwest Passage, 1903-1906. The Norwegian Antarctic expedition with the Fram was in 1910-12. Amundsen is the author of the "Northwest Passage" and "The South Pole."

Secretary of the Navy Denby, who has recently put forth a plea that our navy be kept equal to any, has had a rather eventful life. Born at Evansville, Indiana, in 1870, he went to China at the age of fifteen with his father, who was then United States Minister to China. Young Denby entered the Chinese Imperial Maritime Customs Service when he was seventeen and remained in it for ten years. However, he returned to America in 1894, took the degree of LL. B. from the University of Michigan in 1896, when he was admitted to the bar. During the Spanish-American war he was gunner's mate on the U. S. S. Yosemite. He married in 1911 Miss Thurber of Detroit, a city in which he practices law when not more actively employed. In 1917 he served as a sergeant in the United States Marine Corps and was put on reserve as major in 1919. In 1902-03 he was a member of the Michigan House of Representatives and from 1905 to 1911 was a member of the Fifty-Ninth to Sixty-First Congresses, First Michigan District. All the world knows his later history.

Count Plunkett, the veteran Irish leader who has been so largely photographed in his attendance at Dail sessions, has recently passed his seventieth year. He has spent his long life in the service of Irish progress. The director of the National Museum of Science and Art at Dublin, he has helped to found many societies for the promotion of education and the special study of art, literature, and science. He is by profession a lawyer, but a list of his pursuits is rather that of a professor of archaeology. He is president of the Society for Preservation of the Irish Language; was president of the Museum Association, 1911-12; is vice-president of the National Literary Society, of the Classical Association of Ireland, of the Celtic Congress, of the Arts and Crafts Society of Ireland, and of the International Art Congress. He is governor of the Royal Irish Academy of Music, a member of the Kildare Archaeological Society, of the American-Irish Historical Society, of the Association of Irish Artists, of the Society of Painters in Tempera, of the Société de l'Histoire de l'Art Français, of the Society of Authors, and of a half-dozen others. It is a marvel how even his long life could have encompassed so many studies. He has frequently given courses of lectures on the history of art, Irish painters, sculptors, writers, etc. He is the author of a number of historical and archæo-logical studies, as well as of many contributions to Irish journals and magazines. He was at one time editor of Hibernia, a Dublin review.

That Heathen Chinese.

Which I wish to remark—
And my language is plain—
That for ways which are dark
And for tricks that are vain,
The heathen Chinese is peculiar,
Which the same I would rise to explain.

Ah Sin was his name;
And I shall not deny
In regard to the same
What that name might imply,
But his smile it was pensive and childlike,
As I frequent remarked to Bill Nye.

It was August the third;
And quite soft was the skies;
Which it might be inferred
That Ah Sin was likewise;
Yet he played it that day upon William
And me in a way I despise.

Which we had a small game,
And Ah Sin took a hand:
It was euchre. The same
He did not understand;
But he smiled as he sat by the table;
With the smile that was childlike and bland.

Yet the cards they were stocked
In a way that I grieve,
And my feelings were shocked
At the state of Nye's sleeve;
Which was stuffed full of aces and bowers,
And the same with intent to deceive.

But the hands that were played
By that heathen Chinese,
And the points that he made
Were quite frightful to see—
Till at last he put down a right bower,
Which the same Nye had dealt unto me.

Then I looked up at Nye,
And he gazed upon me;
And he rose with a sigh
And said, "Can this be?
We are ruined by Chinese cheap labour"—
And he went for that heathen Chinese.

In the scene that ensued
I did not take a hand,
But the floor it was strewed
Like the leaves on the strand
With the cards that Ah Sin had been hiding,
In the game "he did not understand."

In his sleeves, which were long,
He had twenty-four jacks—
Which was coming it strong,
Yet I state but the facts;
And we found on his nails, which were taper,
What is frequent in tapers—that's wax.

Which is why I remark,
And my language is plain,
That for ways that are dark,
And for tricks that are vain,
The heathen Chinese is peculiar—
Which the same I am free to maintain.

The Painter Who Pleased Nobody and Everybody.

So very like a painter drew,
That every eye the picture knew.
He hit complexion, feature, air,
So just, the life itself was there.
No flattery with his colors laid
To bloom restored the faded maid;
He gave each muscle all its strength—
The mouth, the chin, the nose's length;
His honest pencil touched with truth,
And marked the date of age and youth.

He lost his friends; his practice failed;
Truth should not always be revealed.
In dusty piles his pictures lay,
For no one sent the second pay.
Two bustos, fraught with every grace,
A Venus' and Apollo's face,
He placed in view; resolved to please,
Whoever sat he drew from these,
From these corrected every feature,
And spirited each awkward creature.

All things were set, the hour was come,
His palette ready o'er his thumb.
My lord appeared, and, seated right,
In proper attitude and light,
The painter looked, he sketched the piece,
Then dipped his pencil,—talked of Greece,
Of Titian's tints, of Guido's air.
"Those eyes, my lord, the spirit there Might well a Raphael's hand require,
To give them all the native fire;
The features, fraught with sense and wit,
You'll grant, are very hard to hit;
But yet with patience you shall view
As much as paint and art can do."
Observe the work. My lord replied,
"Till now I thought my mouth was wide;
Besides, my nose is somewhat long;
Dear sir, for me 'tis far too young."
"Oh, pardon me," the artist cried;
"In this we painters must decide.
The piece ev'n common eyes must strike,—
I warrant it extremely like."

My lord examined it anew;
No looking-glass seemed half so true.
A lady came; with borrowed grace,
He from his Venus formed her face.
Her lover praised the painter's art;
So like the picture in his heart!
To every age some charm he lent;
Ev'n beauties were almost content.
Through all the town his art they praised;
His custom grew, his price was raised.
Had he the real likeness shown,
Would any man the picture own?
But, when thus happily he wrought,
Each found the likeness in his thought.

—John Gay.

A CULTIVATED PICARO.

J. B. Trend Tells of His Excursions in Modern Spain.

Spain has always been a paradise for wanderers, to give a polite and poetical name to a species of traveler for whom industrious Americans have a less dignified title. It is a country with a tradition of nomadic leisure, which means that idle rambling is thought reputable in Spain, even when the Rambler has no money. The nomad of every class and condition meets, in this home land of the picaro, with a sympathetic tolerance he can not be sure of finding elsewhere.

But if, as Walter Ryder maintains, the aristocrat is the man who can be happy without working, Spain may be called a nation of aristocrats. And it is inevitable that she should be interpreted to us most often by the wealthy dilettante and cultivated idler, whose lazy raptures have found within her boundaries congenial refuge from the roar of steam drills and the smoke of industry.

We take it that Mr. J. B. Trend, the author of "A Picture of Modern Spain," is such a man. He is very clearly an Englishman, unmistakably dyed with Oxonian culture, and well able to glimpse and portray certain phases of the Spanish mind. The wandering Schoolmen have an old affinity with Spain, whose universities were once the goal of many pilgrimaging scholars from the north, and the best books about her are still written by men of this type. But when one compares Mr. Trend's Spain with that of Cunningham Graham, for example, one finds him distinctly at a disadvantage on two scores. In the first place he is not a Celt, and especially not a Scot, for of all foreign travelers only the Scotch seem capable of getting beneath the externals of life in Spain. They see in her, not only a pattern of nocturnal guitars and gayety, or of faded splendors in Naples yellow and cobalt, or a mine of architectural and artistic relics, but a kind of "home from home," peopled by a proud, hard, witty, and hospitable race, whose temper has something that rings of the same steel as their own. The kinship of the Scot with the Spaniard is, of course, one of blood. It does not show in the matter of idleness, though their difference in this respect may be solely due to the exigencies of soil and climate. It appears essentially in a certain hardness of logic characterizing the minds of the two peoples, a kind of intellectual cruelty that can coexist with tenderness, and a martial spirit that rather heightens than decreases their susceptibility to beauty and romance. Mr. Trend gets the beauty, and a faint glimpse of the romance, but misses the rest. His second disability is that he has seen Spain in villas, theatres, libraries, city streets, and in ruins accessible by railway rather than as Cunningham Graham has seen it, by the highways along which his mediæval ancestors, with Andrew Ferraras and horn books on their hips, "disputed" their way through the towns of the peninsula.

But within its limits this is a good book. It opens with an interesting essay on Spain in the war and after, Mr. Trend holding that the attitude of the Spanish governing classes during the war was one of shrewd and skeptical detachment. There was a certain sympathy for England, a sentiment of indifference toward France, whose contempt the Spaniards resent, and a tactical leaning toward Germany in military, clerical, and reactionary milieus, where it was felt that the triumph of Germany would favor the security of the privileged classes in Spain. The "Intellectuals" alone were pro-ally, and this largely because they hoped that the triumph of the Allies would introduce a general reconstruction in European government.

The "Intellectuals," however, have always shown a marked preference for German education, barring its military character. This was to be expected in a country where literacy and mechanical progress are at a minimum. The leader of educational reform in Spain is Don José Castillejo y Duarte, who has devoted great energy and talents to the Augean task of remodeling the old system of clerical teaching. Elementary education seems at present to be in a rather lamentable state:

It is impossible to overlook the fact that clerical influence is largely if not entirely responsible for this. Any kind of teaching is systematically discouraged if it tend to awaken curiosity and to lead children to ask questions; the alertness and quick wits of school children from the East End of London would be a tremendous shock, and a very salutary one, to most teachers in the Spanish elementary schools. There are also many schools kept by the Escuelas, i. e., "regular" clergy of the order of the Escuelas Pías (religious schools); the teaching is gratuitous for poor children, but it is hardly worth having. Once I offered a Spanish illustrated paper to the kind and extremely competent chambermaid in a boarding-house at Madrid. She shook her head: "Thank you, but I'm afraid I can't read it!" "But surely," I said, "you've been to school?" "Sí, señor," she replied; "I know all the letters. That's F, that's I, and that one—G; that's it! But I can't read—to understand." In a small garden at Granada in which I wrote during the hot summer days, the cook, and any people who came by with mules, would stand and watch, as if the act of writing were as dexterous an art as painting, playing an instrument, or tying up a fruit-tree. I could only tell him that writing was far less satisfactory in many ways than the art he practiced in the kitchen. Postmen, again, are inclined to go by the look of a letter rather than the written address. At Toledo there was some difficulty about getting letters, both in the hotel and at the postoffice. After the arrival of a telegram in the middle of the night, however, all telegrams from abroad and all letters from England were brought to me for inspection before they were delivered. It was evidently less trouble to do this than to read the address. These are trivial instances, perhaps, but they go to show the weakness of clerical education as it is given in Spain to people who can pay for no other.

In the intellectual regeneration of the country imaginative literature is playing an important part. Beginning with the modern realist, Pérez Galdós, the literary renaissance of Spain has lately brought forth a galaxy of brilliant writers, among whom Mr. Trend gives the palm to Don Pío Baroja. Before becoming a writer Baroja had been a student of medicine and had qualified as municipal doctor at Cestona, where he bought a huge ledger in which to enter the names of his patients. But as he waited for clients to appear, so many pages in the ledger remained blank that he began to fill them with stories of imaginary patients, in the manner of Poe or Dostoevsky, and these he subsequently published as "Vidas Sombrias." Thus he was brought to the attention of Martínez Ruiz Ajojin, one of the clever writers of the journal A. B. C., and made his first step toward literary renown:

A later novel, "El Mayorazgo de Labraz," was built upon memories of a summer when Baroja was medical officer at Cestona. "No one was ill at the time; and as my father, who was then chief engineer for Guipúzcoa and Alava, had to make a survey of some mines, he agreed to take me instead of his assistant. First of all, I had to learn to use a theodolite; and we practiced with it in the garden until I knew how to manage it. When I was more or less proficient my father and I started from Cestona; we went first to Bilbao, from Bilbao to Orozco and Amurrio, and then on to Barambio and Murguía, and various other places till we came out at Guipúzcoa. It was one of those journeys on which one sees very curious things. In a mine at one place I thought of the story 'Bondad Oculta' which is in my book 'Vidas Sombrias'; the mine manager was one of those queer types of industrial magnate who lived like a Sultan with two Galicians, both very pretty. In another place near Murguía we stayed at an inn where I saw the characters which come into the first part of 'El Mayorazgo de Labraz.'"

Baroja does not say where he met the Englishman "Bothwell Crawford," the strange, interesting, eccentric character who disliked England, had lived at Labraz for years, and could forgive the inhabitants everything except their hatred of plants and trees.

"I asked him whether he did not think the author of 'Pickwick' an admirable writer.

"Yes," he replied very seriously, 'he was a good Samnite. Let's drink to his health.'

"The health of some one who is dead?" I asked.

"Well, doesn't he live in his works more than most men, who have no more life than so many beetles?"

They drank to "that good Samnite called Domenico Theotocópuli, el Greco," to Goya and others, and then "Crawford rose to his feet with his glass in his hand, and requested me to do the same. 'And now let us drink to that great gentleman, that great Samnite, painter of painters, Don Diego Velázquez de Silva.' We finished the last bottle [they were drinking old brown sherry], and then the Englishman told me in confidence that he thought Spanish literature on the whole despicable.

"But Cervantes . . ."

"Pooh!"

"Quevedo . . ."

"Psh! Of all Spanish writers the only ones I like are the author of the 'Celestina,' the hidalgo who wrote the ode to his father, and that cleric who says that one day he came to a meadow—"

Verde e bien sencido, de flores bien poblado, Logar cobdiciaduro para omo cansado."

"I did not stop to discuss the Englishman's tastes."

Baroja's earliest novel, "La Casa de Aizgorri," was thought out in the same way one summer when the doctor had nothing particular to do; the distillery which was the livelihood and the wealth of the "House of Aizgorri" he came upon on one of his tramps near San Sebastián. But before he could get to work on the novel he was obliged to go to Madrid.

"Why on earth did you become a baker?" said his friends afterwards. It was a long story, but the main points of it were that one of his uncles, after failing in everything else, had become partner in the first Viennese bakery which was opened in Madrid. Since the death of the other partner, however, the Vienna bread had no longer been selling "like hot cakes"; and Baroja's uncle, dying suddenly, had left a business very much embarrassed, but one which it might be possible to revive. Pío Baroja and his brother set to work; and for the next six years the most original of Spanish living novelists was a master-baker, doing what writing he could in the dark, grimy little office at the back of the bakery, while he made up packets of pennies and halfpennies and entered up the accounts of the delivery men.

Baroja's touchstone of life and character is what he calls an "algo dinámico" or something dynamic, "something with force and go in it"—a quality he has revealed in scenes and persons of a widely varied kind. As regards his own character the "algo dinámico" appears chiefly in his love of the "picaresque":

Baroja has always been a wanderer. Once many years ago he had been seeing the museum at San Sebastián, and they asked him to write his name in the visitors' book. He did so, the director added:

"Put your titles underneath."

"Titles!" exclaimed Baroja. "I haven't any."

"Say what you are. Look here, all the others have done so."

It was true; every one else had written, "Fulano de Tal (i. e., So-and-so), Chief of Administration, third class, and Knight of the Order of Charles III," or "Zutano de Cual, Commanding Battalion, Isabel the Catholic's Own, Cross of Maria Cristina." Baroja in a fit of pique or perversity wrote, "Pío Baroja, Hombre humilde y errante"—a humble man and a wanderer.

In his reminiscences of "Youth and Egotism," he laughs at the occurrence; he never felt particularly humble, he says, and his travels do not amount to much. "Nowadays, I suppose I should put Hombre orgulloso y sedentario—a proud man and a sedentary one." Yet it is true that Baroja has been a wanderer. He has always been in spirit with tramps and outcasts, those on the margins of society; and it is perhaps a reaction from the deadly monotony of a great deal of the life of modern Spain.

So Mr. Trend wanders on, through archive, cloister, and lemon grove, touching on many phases of past and present Spain with a limpid erudition. He tells of Cordova, where in the tenth century dwelt the pious and learned nun, Hrosthwitha, who on learning that the infidel city contained many public baths, "was tempted to experience for the first time this novel indulgence, and was unable to survive her single surrender to the lusts of the flesh." Also of the town of Lérida, where legend has it that Salomé fell through the ice on which she was dancing, thereby cooling the fires of her monstrous passion and having her head severed by the ice as it closed over her. And on through Catalan, that region whose tongue "not even God can understand," till we come to old Barcelona:

What life in Barcelona was like at the end of the eighteenth century may be gathered from Señor Curet's book on the Catalan theatre, and from the "Memories of un Menestral de Barcelona"—the impressions of a certain José Coroleu. The growth of the city was limited by the walls and fortifications which Philip III had built, very much against the will of the citizens; and much of the space was occupied by convents, forts, and barracks. Every day at noon, groups of poor people might be seen gathered about the doors of the convents, waiting for the soup which was given them. Travelers were struck by the incessant bell-ringing, and at night by the Dominican monks in the public squares, who chanted the rosary and explained its mysteries to the exiguous flare of lanterns fixed on poles, while from the neighboring streets came a monotonous chorus of paternosters and ave-marias. But it must not be thought that the Barcelonense had nothing to think of beyond mystical pleasures, sermons, processions, and religious festivals; though there was, it is true, hardly a single day in the year on which something of the kind did not take place. Side by side with a grave austerity, they had a keen sense of humor, and never lost a chance of displaying it. Yet in that patriarchal Barcelona, an excursion by night was a real adventure. Until after the French invasion the streets were only lighted by the votive lamps burning before the shrines of Our Lady and the saints, in the fronts of houses and at street corners. When necessity, or the Italian opera, or the balls of the Carnestolendas (the last three carnival days before Ash Wednesday) compelled people to go out at night and brave the darkness of the deserted streets, they lighted their way with lanterns or torches. Sometimes blind men guided them, for this was the chief occupation of these unfortunate beings, in which they made up for their loss of sight by an instinctive knowledge of the rough and pathless labyrinth of the old town. Religious festivals were always the occasion of rejoicings in the bosom of the family as well as in the streets; and there were pilgrimages to all the sanctuaries in the suburbs. Carnival time, especially, was the high-water mark of gayety in Barcelona; the ostentation of some of the mask balls gave the lie to the proverbial simplicity of old Barcelona. Yet most pleasures were absorbed in the family life. In those austere sitting-rooms, relations, neighbors, and friends met to celebrate family festivals or to finish off public ceremonies such as processions, Tres Toms, the Cabalgata of St. Thomas, and so on. The braseros gave out a pleasant warmth, the classic chocolate and Forn de Sant Jaume biscuits were cleared away and put on the ledge of the fat, bulging chest of drawers which supported the glass case (escaparate) with the image of the tutelary saint of the family. On the mantelpiece were glass shades which covered bunches of wax flowers, and on the walls were prints showing the "Adventures of Telemachus" or the "Loves of Abeldar and Heloise." The evenings were spent in reading "Oscar," "Amanda" or "Las Tardes de la Granja," in reciting romances or telling stories; and sometimes they sang tonadillas, which made a pleasant change from games of forfeits, lotto, or "Custom House." But the form of amusement which was most characteristic of Barcelona, and which most delighted the good people of those days, were the "Shadow Shows" (Funcions de sombras), the ancestors of the magic lantern and cinematograph. By the light of a small lamp, the silhouettes of grotesque figures moved across a screen; they were cut out of paper, and were made at the shop in the Bou de la Plassa Nova, where they sold the little prints or aleuyas which were scattered everywhere on Easter Eve.

But the garrulous memoirs of the old menestral run on for ever; and at the end of the eighteenth century the people of Barcelona went to bed earlier than they do now.

There are interesting chapters on opera, drama, and music in Spain, interspersed with lyric recollections like this:

Before leaving the Carmen, our host made us follow him upstairs to another verandah, just below the roof. Here we were above the tops of the cypresses, and a vast panorama presented itself: the curved backs of the Sierra Nevada, the shadowy outline of the Alhambra Hill and its palaces, the greenish violet of the white walls bathed in moonlight with the rose-colored blotches of the not too frequent lamps, the distant chimneys, the bells to regulate irrigation, the gentle murmur of falling water. We shouted for the music of De Falla. And then, when the musicians had played till they were tired, a poet recited in a ringing voice an ode to the city of Granada. His voice rose as image succeeded image and his astonishing flow of rhetoric fell upon the stillness. What did it matter, he concluded, that the glories of the Alhambra were departed if it were possible to live again such nights as this, equal to, if not surpassing, any of the Thousand and One! He ended, and "the silence surged softly backwards." Then a clock struck four, and we stumbled down into the town over the ungainly cobbles and climbed up the Alhambra under the Duke of Wellington's elm-trees.

And this recollection, with which the author's epicurean memories close:

I bathed and swam lazily about in a tepid, sticky sea which was so blue that I almost expected it to stain me. The effort of swimming in a heavy, clinging traje de baño is not unlike that with which you disentangle Greek or Roman or Renaissance ornament embedded in a Gothic church. How I envied those happy, shameless pagans bathing without trajes farther along the coast!

As the sun drew near to setting the harbor looked like a dish of mercury, and the fishing-boats came in as slowly as if it had really been a dish of mercury after all. The whole population collected on the paseo along the cliff, with soldiers and fishermen gazing at the sea and expectorating with deadly precision on to a projecting rock, hundreds of feet below. The sky changed color in blocks and bands, as if scenery were being shifted, and suddenly it all faded away and grew dark.

And beautiful creatures walked up and down under the trees, and the little hands of babes and sucklings learned to open their fans in invitation and close them with a contemptuous click.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending January 21, 1922, were $136,500,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $141,400,000; a decrease of $4,900,000.

The opinion was expressed here some time ago that the fall rise would culminate about the end of October. The rally was delayed somewhat by the threatened railway strike and it was undoubtedly aided by the quickly-assured success of the Washington Arms Limitation Conference. But, even after allowing for the deviation from the normal course very strong on Monday because of the accumulation of buying orders over the week-end, and normally there follows a reaction on Tuesday. But, when the public is loaded up, the volume of week-end orders dwindles, the market hesitates and often declines on Monday, with a countermovement and strength on Tuesday.

The point is that such strength on Tuesday is quite often artificial, for pools that are distributing stocks must cover up the evidences of weakened buying power. May it not be that the display of strength, through the expedient of sharp run-ups in special issues, in the normally reactionary months of November and December was quite as artificial? At least there is ground for the suspicion that the industrial section of the market was artificially stimulated and held up longer than it would naturally have stayed up, and, if that was the case, the conclusion must be that it was done for the purpose of completing a heavy distribution of industrial stocks. All of which leads one to the conclusion that industrial stocks are more likely to decline than to advance in the spring of 1922.

And conclusions arrived at over the more dependable route of fundamental conditions agree with the foregoing. Near-poverty on the farms has never been known to breed industrial prosperity. The same may be said of the existing disjointed situation as to materials, costs, wages, and selling prices. A good harvest this year, along with adjustment of industrial operations to a profit-making basis, should set things right. But, according to present indications, it will likely be mid-summer before the outlook will be clear enough to warrant another upturn in industrial stocks as a group.

As has been pointed out several times, the outlook is clearest for investment bonds and stocks, and for railroad, public utility, and copper stocks. Investment issues are most attractive; first, because of the probability that money rates will continue to work lower; and, second, because the uncertain earnings outlook for industrial concerns will bring to the investment list a largely increased demand. Railroads and public utility companies always fair best in periods of declining prices, for, in general, such a movement means lower cost of production for a service which is sold at fixed rates. The copper companies have weathered a period of severe readjustment and their affairs are now on the mend and should continue to improve. Such stocks as Anaconda, Chile, Cerro de Pasco, Inspiration, and Utah should be bought to hold.

Among the rails, Atchison, Illinois Central, Southern Pacific, Union Pacific, and Chesapeake & Ohio may be mentioned as particularly attractive to purchase on the reaction. After some reaction, the public utility favorites of last year, such as American Telephone & Telegraph, Consolidated Gas, Pacific Gas & Electric, North American, and People's Gas, should be a purchase again. The most attractive of the speculative rails are Rock Island, "Nickel Plate," Pere Marquette, St. Louis Southern, Texas & Pacific, and the "new" stocks of the Missouri, Kansas & Texas.

Specialties that look good are Central Leather, Maxwell Motors, Sears-Roebuck, and Lee Rubber & Tire.

The total value of the mineral production of California for the year 1921 is conservatively estimated by the statistical division of the state mining bureau, under direction of Fletcher Hamilton, state mineralogist, to have been approximately $244,856,910. This estimated total is an increase of $2,757,243 over the value of the 1920 production, and is due mainly to increases by petroleum, gold, and silver. Preliminary reports indicate a record yield by petroleum for the year 1921. The total would have been even greater than here shown but for the strike of employees in the San Joaquin Valley fields during September and October. The first eight months of 1921 the yield averaged 10,100,000 barrels per month. The increase in total value for the year was not in the same proportion as the increase in quantity, because the price was somewhat lower ($1.60 per barrel, against $1.73) than that for 1920. The figure here used is the average of quotations for 24-degree gravity oil in the San Joaquin fields during 1921.

Gold mining in California has apparently passed the low point in its career due to the war-time and post-war economic situation, and is now on the upgrade again. Reports indicate a revival in many gold districts and the output for the year, based on eleven months' shipments, is estimated at $15,800,000, or an increase of approximately $1,500,000. Silver is estimated at $3,500,000 (at $1 per ounce), the greatest of any year (except one, 1884) in California. This is due to the persistence of high-grade ore shipments from the California Rand mine and adjacent leases, near Randsburg. Copper, though decreasing about one-sixth in quantity, shows a little over one-half the value of the previous year, due to the drop in price from an average of 18.4 cents to 12.6 cents per pound. Lead, zinc, and quicksilver all show material decreases, both in quantity and in value per unit. The output of quicksilver was the lowest in the history of that metal in California, and is due directly to the competition of cheaper foreign metal imported from Spain and Italy, against which we have only a negligible tariff protection. Magnesite shows a decrease of about 25 per cent. in quantity. The condition at present confronting the domestic producers of quicksilver, magnesite, tungsten, chromite, manganese, and talc (to mention only those minerals in which California is especially interested), make it necessary that a tariff should be placed on foreign importations if our domestic output of these ores is to continue.

Across the threshold of 1922 stands the sign: "In America capital is crippled by an unequal, unjust, and confiscatory income tax, bedeviled by commissions, regulating boards, and prying government agents, and harassed by uneconomic legislation at the hands of demagogues. As a result, business initiative is killed and stagnation prevails" (says the Farmers and Merchants Bank of Los Angeles in its monthly financial letter).

Rather a startling sign for New Year's Day, especially as the good old egg-nog, the hot apple-toddy and Tom-and-Jerry no longer adorn the family sideboard. Sorrow can no longer be drowned in the flowing bowl.

List of Current Offerings on Application

While 1921 was a year of extremely heavy liquidation in all lines, no one must imagine that we are yet through with the mopping-up process. Production has outstripped demand in all manufacturing lines. During, or after the war, thousands of new industries were launched without sufficient capital for normal times. Business experience was lacking in the management of many of them. The majority of these institutions will, if not already on the rocks, be forced out of business by the keen competition of larger and financially sounder concerns. The cost of production must be reduced. Overhead charges will have to be cut to meet present conditions. Salaries of those in managerial capacities, which were unduly increased under the stimulus of war activities, will have to be curtailed. The wages of labor will, as a purely economical proposition, have to be reduced. In the past, no one cared what expenses of carrying on a business amounted to, as long as the consumer bore the burden. The capacity of the consumer to bear this burden has been destroyed. As a result, consumers have curtailed consumption, many from necessity, and many from resentment at prevailing high prices. Nearly all staple commodities are selling at wholesale at or below pre-war levels. Manufacturing costs have, in many lines, been reduced, but the buying public does not get the benefit of these reductions. The same rule applies to foreign purchasers as to domestic consumers. While our export trade has decreased, it is at the average pre-war level. In the face of the great increase in our productive capacity, pre-war levels in export trade look small to us.

All of these things result in curtailment of business activities and unemployment. These evils are added to by uneconomic legislation, whereby the burdens of what is called the capitalistic class are rendered well-nigh un-caused by these factors, the fact remains that the rally went further and persisted over a longer period than the writer—in common with several observers in Wall Street—thought probable (says J. G. Donley in Forbes Magazine).

The logical thing to look for was a reaction in November and December, to be followed by a January rally, and, later, a secondary reaction in February and early March, preparatory to the spring rise. This leads up to the question: If the market went contrary to expectations in the closing months of 1921, will it continue to upset precedent in the early months of 1922? The answer may be suggested by an old, unwritten law of speculation which may be stated thus: When, after a rise, stocks are strong on such normally reactionary days as Tuesday and Thursday, look out for a decline. It sounds absurdly superstitious, but it is really based on many years of market observation by the shrewdest traders. In a bull market stocks are usually bearable. Some speeding up in production in a few lines has occurred, but only to supply stocks which have been slowly depleted. When this gap is filled, stagnation will again occur.

An abundance of cheap money was the big factor which brought about a steady advance in the general list of stocks. Pools were active in all the better class of stocks and they had very little opposition, as the short interest was large and sentiment was more bullish than for some time (says E. F. Hutton & Co. in their monthly review).

The action of the market itself has a great deal to do with public sentiment, and while there were plenty of minor reactions, the undertone remained firm. During the past month prices went through to new high average levels, in spite of the general talk of inevitable reaction that usually takes place near the close of the year.

Copper and steel issues had a particularly change in the shop rules, announced by the Railway Labor Board, holding that overtime pay shall not begin until after ten hours of work instead of eight, is of great importance and should make possible further economies.

Oil stocks were active and higher, under the leadership of Standard Oil issues. Talk of mergers was the principal factor, and as the public are partial to oil stocks at present, it did not take much buying to bring about a general advance. Oil is one commodity that seems to be in better demand as time goes on, and while there was considerable selling of the Mexican issues at times, due to talk of salt water, this same argument was used on the constructive side of the American companies.

On the whole, the market has given a good account of itself, considering the depression in general business, and the unfavorable news that comes from Europe. The public, however, have become hardened to this kind of news, and no longer becomes frightened into selling their stocks, believing that conditions are bound to get better rather than worse.

Preliminary reports of Class 1 railroads thus far received indicate an average return for November of 4 per cent. as compared with 5.4 in October on railroad stocks. All of them showed smaller gross receipts than in October, but the shrinkage is very uneven, and to some extent is accounted for by the unusually large amount of business that was crowded into October by the threatened railway employees' strike, thus materially increasing the earnings for that month and decreasing those for November. The Union Pacific, Pennsylvania, and Reading all made, in November, the best revenue showing of any month in the year except October, and some of the other lines made a better showing in November than in September, while not as good as in October.

The statements are perplexing in the absence of detailed information concerning them for purposes of comparison, and while they are somewhat disappointing, they are not enough so to discourage people from investing in these properties who believe that they will make a good showing under improved business conditions that are confidently predicted in the near future.

The Freeman, Smith & Camp Company are offering $110,000 Morrow County, Oregon, 5½ per cent. road bonds, price 102.40 and accrued interest, to yield 5½ per cent., due December 1, 1929.

Morrow County has an area of 2025 square miles, almost identical with that of the State of Delaware. Wheat is the principal product, the 1921 crop having exceeded 2,000,000 bushels. Next in importance is wool, of which approximately 2,250,000 pounds is marketed at Heppner annually. There is also a large cattle industry, while diversified farming and dairying are growing sources of wealth.

An offering of $125,000 Gilliam County, Oregon, 5 per cent. road bonds, price 101.55 and accrued interest, to yield 5½ per cent., is also being made by the same company.

Gilliam County, Oregon, is one of the most important in the state, being very well known in wheat production, with an area of 1201 square miles. It today ranks fourth in wheat production in the counties of the United States. It established its first record for wheat shipments in 1907, when it led the world in wheat shipments. This record was surpassed in 1921. It is the only county in the State of Oregon where dollar wheat may be raised and sold at a profit. The county is also one of the best in the state for producing wool, cattle, sheep, hogs, and is also noted for its diversified agriculture.

Cyrus Peirce & Co., Blyth, Witter & Co., and Banks, Huntley & Co. are offering $3,000,000 San Joaquin Light and Power Corporation 7 per cent. cumulative prior preferred stock. Preferred both as to assets and earnings. Price 98½, netting over 7.10 per cent.

The corporation owns and operates ten hydro-electric plants. Five of these plants are located on the north fork of the San Joaquin River and have a combined capacity of 30,000 horsepower. Water to operate these plants is impounded in the Crane Valley Reservoir, which has a storage capacity of 50,000 acre feet. The new Kerckhoff plant of 50,000 horsepower capacity located on the main San Joaquin river receives full benefit of the water stored in the Crane Valley Reservoir, the full flow of the main San Joaquin River and all storage thereon. The four other plants are located: One on the Tule River, of 6700 horsepower; one on the Kern River, of 12,000 horsepower; two on the Merced River, with a combined capacity of 1050 horsepower.

It has also in operation a modern steam plant at Bakersfield of 35,000 horsepower capacity, and a new steam plant at Button Willow (completed June 10, 1921) of 17,000 horsepower capacity, and steam reserve plants in Fresno and Betteravia of 3990 horsepower combined capacity.

There are 1058 miles of high tension lines, 2750 miles of secondary lines, and thirty-seven substations. Natural gas, which is purchased at a very low price, is used in generating power at the Bakersfield and Button Willow steam plants. The gas used is at an equivalent of 55 cents per barrel of oil, whereas the price of oil at the present time is $1.35.

good tone, notwithstanding the reports from the weekly publication of general poor business. Traders who were buying were talking about the future, and the opinion was freely expressed that we had seen the worst of the depression, and that any change could only be favorable to the constructive side.

Railway earnings for November show a very disappointing decline in traffic, whether compared with the previous month or with last year. Nevertheless investment demand from people who have always considered them as prime investments keeps prices up, together with the buying from a more speculative group, which holds the conviction that when the pick-up in business comes, present rates will show that the roads are in the best position they have held since 1906. ## BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

The fascination of history is almost as great as the fascination of divining the future. For it is nearly as great an unknown quantity. And yet by a curious paradox we read the future from the past. The process reduces itself to using a unit of unknown quantity to measure something of unknown dimensions. But the human race is naturally mystical and it loves mysteries. If the facts of history were incontrovertible, there would be neither an historical science nor literature. It is the everlasting attempt to interpret history that provides a field for writers of a scholarly bent of mind and a pedagogical—or is it demagogical?—instinct, and the reading public with one of its favorite forms of recreation which it likes blandly to call "cultivating its mind." In short, one piously ejaculates, "May history never be solved!" One would be shorn, for instance, of one's favorite brand of loyalty. It is socially immaterial whether you are a Methodist or an Episcopalian, but one's entire intellectual associations are colored by the fact that he is a Darwinian or a transcendentalist. And whichever one is one reads history for arguments to support the cause. It is perfectly astonishing how the same fact can be adduced to support either side.

Hence, I think, the popularity of the outline of history. For the idea of the historical outline is not a new one. The original historical impulse was linear. In fact, the medieval chronicles resemble a "line-a-day" diary. But our recent efflorescence of outline history is not exactly on the medieval model. It essays to give perspective rather than movie continuity. It is history en profile rather than history seen through the magnifying glass of daily entries. But even the epitome of history is no new thing. All ancient folk stories and sagas are attempts to epitomize racial history. Sir Walter Raleigh, languishing in prison three hundred years ago, beguiled his political exile by writing a history of the world. And if it had ever seen the light of publication its arguments would in all probability have sufficed to point a moral and adorn a tale of many a Jacobean drawing-room or coffee-house discussion quite as Mr. Wells' compilation furnishes our dinner-tables with learned comment. The moral is that each age needs its own outline. The field is a sempiternally fertile one. It need never be exhausted. History can always be reinterpreted according to our needs.

Three outlines of history, one of which is rapidly approaching the fame of the outline, have appeared within a year of each other. The recent one-volume third edition of Mr. Wells' The Outline of History, Macmillan: $5 makes a comparative criticism of the three timely. "The Story of Mankind," by Hendrick van Loon (Boni & Liveright: $5), and "A Short World History," by E. M. Wilmot-Buxton (E. P. Dutton & Co.), are the other two of our trilogy.

It should be explained at the outset that "The Story of Mankind" is written ostensibly for children, as the "Outline of History" pitches its tone for the general reader and "A Short World History" presupposes a thorough historical knowledge on the part of its reader. The books should be judged, therefore, according to their own standards. And of the three Mr. van Loon's standard is perhaps the highest and the hardest to attain. For it is one thing to fuse all history together when your listener collaborates to the extent of already knowing the isolated facts, and it is considerably more difficult to present history to a reader who knows a scrap here and a scrap there, but whose lapses are far more frequent than his bull's-eyes. But it is still more difficult to write history so that the child who knows nothing about it receives a clear and scientific information. I said that "The Story of Mankind" was written ostensibly for children. That is Mr. van Loon's gracious way of avoiding the invidious. His book is written with such an amazing perspicacity and is so richly illustrative that a child of ten could read it with perfect comprehension and would probably retain as a result a sound basis of historical knowledge throughout his life. However, the pellucid quality of "The Story of Mankind" is not wasted on the adult reader, who is often glad to have his muddles straightened out for him, even though he be too shamefaced to admit them to himself. No matter, I venture to say, how great his erudition, the adult reader will profit by "The Story of Mankind." There is a difference between possessing a mental card catalogue of historical events which you could recite forward or backwards, if need were, and possessing a really vivid realization of what life was like in even historic times. Henry James has coined a useful phrase—"the sense of the past." It is the sense of the past rather than a conclusion that one gets from "The Story of Mankind."

The cue to this extraordinary book is quoted in its dedication—"What is the use of a book without pictures?" said Alice. And we must admit that Mr. van Loon's perspicuity is intensified by his illuminating cartoons, which shed a light, not indeed comparable to the murkiness of daylight, but rather to the bright clarity of Mr. van Loon's imagination.

So much for the perfect vividness of "The Story of Mankind." Contrasted with it "The Outline of History" veers rather to the category of the card index. But one can not have everything. You must either offer up perfect perspicuity on the altar of scholarship or you must sacrifice the comparison of theories to re-creating the past. Our historians were consistent with their aim. Nor must it be inferred that Mr. van Loon imposes his own theory on his supposedly naive readers. The limiting of his material again played into his hands, even as his "writing down" to children gave him opportunity to be more explicit than an historian has ever dared be before. His restriction this time is to hold himself within the bounds of uncontroversial material. By being so his book has performed still another valuable service in winnowing the accepted facts of anthropology and history from theory and doubt. But to return to "The Outline of History." Its compact one-volume edition and its corresponding cost are a boon to the student. It is doubtless the first time in history that an adequate outline record of the past has been compressed into one volume. The mere feat of writing the history of the world in a thousand pages is an astounding tour de force. For it, moreover, to be brilliantly written by one of our foremost publicists is still more astonishing. Histories are usually written by historians, and too often, alas, the literary style of the professional historian is not sans peur de reproche—if one may do such violence to a respectable phrase. However, as all the world knows, "The Outline of History" avoids this, the commonest fault of written history. The present one-volume "educational edition" can not be too highly praised for its compactness, readability, and general all around adequacy.

"A Short World History," by E. M. Wilmot-Buxton, is more the academic epitome than is either of the other two books. It is obvious from its limited space of 214 pages that an age must be compressed into a paragraph. And the method is feasible only by assuming, as the author does, that his reader is in possession of the details. The raison-d'être of such a book is nevertheless twofold. It does not instruct in the constructive sense that both Mr. Wells' and Mr. van Loon's books do. But it does give a reader with a scattered knowledge of history a proper perspective, and it serves as a ready reference book. In fact for the person who strenuously objects to wading through much that he already knows "A Short World History" is preferable to either of the other two outlines. But for one who does not mind having his present store of information more firmly entrenched while it is being augmented with fresh material, either "The Outline of History" or "The Story of Mankind" will undoubtedly prove more delightful reading. Again, these three books are not interchangeable in purpose. Where Mr. van Loon attempts to reproduce the past itself for us and where Mr. Wells tries to pack all history into one volume, Mr. Wilmot-Buxton's aim is to trace the line of economic development throughout the rise and fall of empires. And yet each of these books is an outline of world history, and each of them treats the same facts according to their own purpose. Perhaps, after all, a one-volume outline is inadequate and history should be attacked from at least three angles in order to get the proper parallax. R. G.

Notes of Books and Authors.

The Vailima edition of Robert Louis Stevenson's work, which is being published in twenty-six volumes, will include a number of interesting papers contained in the rare and now practically unobtainable Edinburgh edition, which was issued in 1896. Among other additions which relate to Stevenson's childhood is a hitherto unpublished diary kept by Stevenson's mother from the time of his birth until he was seven years old, and a "History of Moses" and "History of Joseph" which Stevenson wrote at the age of six.

Of W. H. Hudson's "A Shepherd's Life" Richard Le Gallienne says, "I know nothing quite like it in English literature, except the works of George Borrow," and adds: "In spirit it is one of the loveliest books ever written. It smells sweet, as with hay and

Of Mr. Hudson's most recent books, "A Traveler in Little Things," also published by the Duttons, Mr. Le Gallienne says that it is a sort of companion book to "A Shepherd's Life," for "its quality is the same."

In an interview in the Drama, Tony Sarg, whose marionette book, published by Huebsch, is proving so popular among children, tells how difficult it is to get suitable plays for his marionette theatre. "I have had loads and loads of plays submitted," says Mr. Sarg, "but most of them are unsuitable. I want plays with elements that can not be carried out on the regular stage. For instance, in 'The Rose and the Ring' the butler turns into a door-knob before your eyes, and in another play the boy grows tall and ghosts come out of bottles. None of these things can be done with real actors." How these feats are accomplished in "The Rose and the Ring" is told in the "Tony Sarg Marionette Book."

Putting up a Memorial, whether it is a simple Tablet or an elaborate Mausoleum, brings forth a multitude of queries—as to materials of worth and their producers. It is much the same as investing in a fine watch or mechanism. It can not be taken apart for critical examination. The thing to look for, then, is the reputation of the maker, his reliability and that of his product.

BRIEFER REVIEWS.

Sinclair Lewis has a good deal on his artistic conscience, but he must squirm occasionally with a sense of unsolicited responsibility as he watches one after another of the young literators of the country vamping out their variations of his Main Street style. In every literary movement one finds a number of writers commonly designated as "followers," gleaners of the field who follow after the literary originators to pick up a slender harvest from the newly-reaped area. If there is anything odd or distinctive about the style of a book that wins a widespread success, it will be repeated in various forms by the industrious scribblers who swarm and rumor in the fiction factories that now overspread the country. For some reason or other the style of Mr. Lewis has commended itself to hosts of these, as providing a sure path to success. This does not imply that Mr. John H. Walsh's book, "Glenwood of Shipbay" (The Macmillan Company), has a mercenary origin, or is devoid of literary value. It is merely in style a regrettable addition to the swelling horde of novels in which truncated sentences, hectic elisions, synecdoches, and verbal tag ends serve to sum up the mysteries of man and nature. Apart from this, the book offers an interesting picture of modern life in a New England shipbuilding town, and introduces a hero who has something of the breeze and go of Mr. Birmingham's sun-burned and wave-washed Irishmen. It has, as a whole, the touch of freshness never lacking from longshore tales, when told by a first-hand observer.

The problem of children's reading and of story-telling to children too young to read is solved by a set of six books called "My Book House," edited by Olive Beaupré Miller (published by the Book House for Children; $32). The books are very attractively gotten up, the illustrations being of a high order and the bindings durable enough for even nursery usage. The material, which is drawn from all the classic sources of children's literature, is graded in the six volumes from the earliest nursery tales to the requirements of the high school student. The latter is perhaps at an age when he prefers the originals to adapted versions, but the books should be admirably useful for children from two or three to twelve or thirteen.

Palm Beach has a poet in the person of George Graham Currie, who has written a volume of rhythmical sentiments and descriptions called "Songs of Florida and Other Verse" (New York: James T. White & Co.). It is a sad reflection on the present state of American poetry that a lawyer with a rhyming gift can write a book of platitudinous jingles that runs into a third edition, while the work of James Montague remains unbound. We had thought the trough of the poetic wave achieved when Julia Moore introduced herself as the Sweet Singer of Michigan, but

The Songs of Florida
Are even horridier,
And Other Verse
Is Worse.

The eminence of Stephen Crane as a master of the short story is less well known than his skill in the panoramic novel, so vividly displayed in "The Red Badge of Courage." He earned a good deal of ridicule in the '90s and praise since then, by the daring with which he departed from the old rules of prosody in his verse, anticipating some of the metrical innovations of modern poetry. It is open to question whether Tolstoy has not surpassed him as a painter of war, and it is certain that his verse is rather crude beside the work of modern artificers in the medium with which he experimented. But there can be no question about his mastery of the short story. He has the art of crisp and concise narration, a miraculously even pitch, or "surface" as Henry James used to call it, together with a fine sense of emphasis and perspective. In addition he possesses what many of our admirable technicians in the short story lack—the gift of sincerity. A collection of his tales has been added to the Modern Library Series by the publishers, Boni & Liveright (New York), under the title "Men, Women, and Boats." The first story in the anthology is "The Open Boat," now a classic. There is another story of the sea, "The Reluctant Voyagers," and a number of war sketches, interesting now in retrospect, and in the light of more recent war literature. Vincent Starrett has written the introduction, with a very just estimate of Crane's character and genius, and a quotation from an eloquent letter about him by Robert Burr, written just before Crane's tragically early death. The debt of America to the Modern Library Series is growing.

LEONARD MERRICK AND AMERICA.

Describing in the New York Times an interview in London with Leonard Merrick, R. C. Feld quotes him as follows concerning his feeling about American appreciation for his novels: "There is a very good reason for my special fondness for Americans. My English friends think I am a maniac on the subject. They can't understand it at all. Yet I suppose it is due to America that I am here today. If it weren't for the American publications that took my stuff twenty and more years ago I should probably have died of starvation. That isn't exaggeration. I couldn't sell my short stories in England at all. Or, if I did, it was at the enormous sum of four shillings and sixpence a story. That's about ninety cents at present exchange. After a great while they raised my price to six shillings a story—a dollar and twenty cents. I should never have got anywhere if my stories hadn't begun to go in America. It was my American readers who made it possible for me to go on plugging in the hope of really arriving some day." Leonard Merrick has "arrived" now, in both England and America, for the edition of his novels and collected short stories being published by E. P. Dutton & Co., with an introduction to each volume by some famous English or American author, is selling in both countries like the proverbial "hot cakes." But even yet Merrick is more appreciated in America than he is in England and the circle of his admirers is constantly growing. He told the interviewer also about his early recollections of this country when he came over here as a very young man to try to make a living at newspaper work. "There are other associations," he explained, "that make America dear to me. When I was a little over twenty I went to the United States and stayed there about nine months. It was then I had my experience as a reporter. I stayed in a boarding-house on West Fifteenth Street. What a boarding-house! Never have I seen another like it and never do I hope to see another like it. It was a gem, a joy, an oasis, in the desert! What remains most clearly in my memory are the meals. There are people here who tell me that Americans do not know how to cook, but I—I know better. I was a very hungry boy at the time—I had never had too much to eat in England. I was certainly no modest admirer of the table at that boarding-house." The interviewer took Mr. Merrick to a little Italian restaurant in Soho about which the novelist had not known, and was so sure that he would weave a romance out of what he learned about the place and its proprietor that the account of the interview is headed "Story Stalking with Leonard Merrick." "He looked around the walls," the interviewer goes on, "paneled with paintings of every modern school of art, and began asking questions. Leonard Merrick, the spinner of tales, was on the alert."

On the 27th of January the Houghton Mifflin Company will publish in America the play "Shakespeare," by Messrs. Bax and Rubinstein. Literary England has been in a storm about this play. "Do our authors really imagine that men of genius break their hearts over women!" St. John Ervine exclaimed in his review. "Do they ask us to believe that a man so great as Shakespeare valued a minx from Elizabeth's court more than he valued his plays and poems?" Yes, the young playwrights do ask us to believe this to be not only the possible but the probable truth. You can read this play and disagree with its conception, but not without admiration for its skill, and not without feeling tensely the reality of Shakespeare the man.

"JANE CLEGG."

This play of St. John Ervine's, which has had big runs both in London and New York, must have cost Arthur Maitland a pretty penny in royalties, for much less distinguished playwrights than St. John Ervine are not at all bashful in respect to the size of the royalties they charge for the use of their plays.

"Jane Clegg" offers another instance—already shown in "John Ferguson"—of St. John Ervine's adherence to the idea of making his plays transcripts of life. "Jane Clegg" is a domestic tragedy of a rather sordid order; a transference to the stage of the sort of thing we read of in the daily papers; those kinds in which families are rent asunder through the worthlessness of a husband or wife, without the attendant sensation of murder or suicide. The author is not in the least degree concerned in conveying a moral; for Henry Clegg works out toward the destiny that is inevitable in men of his kind. A worthless weakling, there is no hope in the future for such as he, and we give a sigh of relief when Jane performs a surgical operation on her destiny and cuts herself loose from her shifty mate.

Every single one of the personages in the play, even including the two tots, each of whom takes after a different parent, is a study in character.

Jane is one of those unlucky women who is bothered by a sense of logic. She sees that she gives her husband faithful service, constant hard work, and fidelity, and all she receives is a scant living. Henry's mother is all that Jane is not, illogical, demonstrative, shallow, a senseless partisan, feebly emotional, and primitively loyal to her own. She is unable to think, and therefore she chatters. What a terrible destiny for a woman of Jane's instinctive dignity and decent reserve to have this feeble old conventionalist perpetually chattering, chattering, chattering her apologies for thoughts! The mother-in-law joke is practically dead at last; killed by the warm camaraderie that frequently exists between the modern mother-in-law and her son-in-law. But the real incubus of a mother-in-law is the kind that sits, an uncongenial figure, on the hearthstone and depends upon a reluctant daughter-in-law for those services to age that her own children often do not give her. For mark, that when the Cleggs fell apart it was the wife that was going to shelter and care for the witless and inane fool that she gently, and with much inward endurance, called "mother."

Henry Clegg is painted as one of those smart, shallow rascals that are as unreliable as the shifting sands. He is headed for certain trouble, but somehow men like him who are absolutely ruthless in their method of preying upon every one whose destiny touches theirs, often come out ahead in the little things of life—like Jane's precious £140—even while, in the greedy grasp of comparative trifles, they lose what makes life a real success.

The other characters are presented as typical of the several kinds of people we run against in the turmoil of life and from whom the Henry Cleggs generally manage to wrest something.

"Jane Clegg" is not as tragic as "John Ferguson," although its note never pipes a cheerful tune. But the domestic interior is so simple and natural, and we may extract much, if somewhat sardonic, amusement from the character of old Mrs. Clegg, and a fascinated interest in the gradual unrelenting of the sordid investiture of lies in which Henry Clegg habitually enwrapped himself.

An amusing touch to the character of Henry—true son to that feeble conservative, old Mrs. Clegg—was the discovery we made in the last moments of the parting between husband and wife that Henry was a conventionalist. This paltering, lying rogue, this thorough-paced rascal, was a conventionalist! And his conventionality was deeply shocked by his wife's cold abstention from tears, emotion, or a last embrace. His feeling, as he looked at the wronged woman who, he admitted, was too good to be of his kind, was, "Why, she doesn't act as she should! She doesn't cry, or make a fuss!" For Henry really belonged to that order of beings who say, like boarding-school misses—the most conventional beings on God's footstool—"It isn't done!"

"Jane Clegg" is so naturalistic a play that it vitalizes players into doing their very best. There wasn't one player, in the cast of seven, but to me was the character represented.

Mr. Maitland hit upon exactly the right manner to convey Henry's shallow, cowardly rascality, and was admirably true to the type represented in the brisk, false assurance, the sudden, suspicious glances, and in the pretended good-fellowship.

Miss Penman expressed, in a dejected, habitual monotone, the hopeless outlook of a deeply deceived woman who is vainly trying to bolster herself up to a regaining of her lost confidence.

Mr. Al Cunningham showed his usual competence in the rôle of a fellow-clerk who has discovered Henry's fraudulent doings, and Carrie Lamont's depiction of the old woman was so real that I was haunted, as we came away, by a sympathetic perception of what life held in the future for her daughter-in-law, in the way of grim endurance.

And Walter Carey, given the rôle of a cheated and be-fooled and victimized pal of Henry's, emphatically made good. The young man may say "merried" and "kerridge" to the end of the chapter, but he has stuck faithfully to his job, worked hard, and mastered it. Monday night he ceased to be Walter Carey, and became Muncie. There was his victory.

Let any one of our timid theatre-goers be afraid of sombreness, let me say that the reason why "Jane Clegg" has succeeded so well is because the spectator's attention, interest, and sympathy are so firmly riveted. I found myself anxious for Jane to cut herself loose from the diseased tissue, apprehensive lest she give the money, and dejectedly counting the inroads she had made on her capital, when she vainly tried to save the family pride by financial self-sacrifice.

Jane is the kind of woman that men do not love much, because she is ruled more by her head than her heart. And as such Miss Penman truthfully depicted her.

The play is a slice of life. Even the playing, the squabbles of the children—very well done, by the way, by two child players—had the stamp of nature, and when the curtain fell we saw Jane in the future, mercifully free of Henry, deriving much comfort from the boy, and finding that the girl was reviving some of the old problems furnished by that cheerful, elusive rogue, her father. Thus every true play leaves a lingering impress on us, as we come away.

A FAMOUS INTERPRETER.

In the near future the dates will be fixed for a series of readings by Miss Dorothea Spinney, famed as an interpreter of Browning and admired for the rare distinction of her readings of the Greek tragedies.

The subjects of the promised readings mentioned so far are "Alkestis," "Medea," and "Hamlet." Miss Spinney will give these readings in the Maitland Theatre, which assures her a central site. The lady has just reached San Francisco on her return from a prolonged world tour, which included Australia, where she gave many readings with marked success.

It is doubtful if San Franciscans will again have such an opportunity as was enjoyed by them in the two visits of this distinguished artist within a comparatively short space of time; for, it will be remembered, Miss Spinney gave several readings here before departing for her Australian tour. But her home in England calls her, and possibly she may not return.

Miss Spinney is one of those artists who creates, by the simplest but most effective means, an atmosphere on the stage or platform from which she gives her readings. And then, with musical, flowing diction, with the free yet restrained gestures of poetic tragedy, and with the dignity of a true artist, she enacts the scenes she reads, and revives, for her hearers, the classic atmosphere of sun-bathed Greece, or leads them through the gloomy corridors of Elsinore.

It is a rare treat she offers us, and one that casts the illumination of a fine and sympathetic intelligence on those old poetic tragedies thus newly revealed to us.

LOCAL PRODUCTION.

The big Eastern managers are, financially, up a tree, in respect to sending their productions on so expensive a tour as one that leads to San Francisco. Perhaps this is why local enterprise burns rather more brightly these times. Take the production of "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," for instance, which now, this Friday and Saturday, is in its last two nights at the Players Theatre.

Molière's rogue in his time was so great, and his favor at Louis' court so assured, that his plays, including his gayest and most irreverent comedies, had an opulent setting, and were presented with much ceremony. All this conveyance of the wealth and ostentatious splendor which surrounded the parvenu Jourdain is amply conveyed in the original little playhouse upon Bush Street.

When the curtain rose and we marked the richly-draped salon and the gold-embroidered velvets and silks of the bowing sycophants surrounding Jourdain, we almost rubbed our eyes.

Whence came all this splendor? we asked ourselves. Weren't the "Players" going it rather strong, and wouldn't they find themselves in debt if they kept up the pace like this?

But, as it happens, there is no imprudent extravagance there, in spite of the rich and beautiful result.

The richly-tinted, deep-rose hangings are all made of cheesecloth, their colors beautifully enhanced by an artful arrangement of lights. The velvet and silk of the costumes are all of cotton, for corduroy and sateen are used. Every costume was designed by Gerstle Mack, art director of the Players Theatre, and made by Tillie Myers, who superintends the wardrobe department.

Katherine Edson is also attached to the service of the Players, and, aside from the personal success she made in "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" by enhancing with her fine stage presence and beautiful poses the series of excellent stage pictures presented, she trained the ballet, who did their job like professionals.

It really is something to be proud of that this unique little organization, far from the madding New York crowd, can stand on its two feet, and, within its own walls, accomplish a production as a production at once handsome, tasteful, and unique.

"LE MALADE IMAGINAIRE."

When the curtain rose on the first scene of "Le Malade Imaginaire" at La Gaité Française, André Ferrier, as Argan, the hypochondriac, looked an almost exact reproduction of Argan, as portrayed so graphically in the old Louis Leloir steel engravings. Mr. Ferrier is excellent in make-ups, as shown in his death-mask of a face as the paralytic in his recent Grand Guignol play. And his make-up, in its general effect, of the hypochondriac is first-class.

I freely confess that I am not partial to reading the Molière plays. They are so long, and the times called for that jovial prolixity that prolonged the laughter to attenuation and final exhaustion, and that, being meant for stage representation only, becomes tedious in the reading. But who would have thought the ancient humor would have appealed so irresistibly to a modern audience?

For the laughter was almost perpetual, and not a witticism missed fire.

True, Molière could avail himself of a license not allowed in our time. The hypochondriac of Argan, his unctuous dwelling upon the details of the apothecary's bills, and the numerous references to "les entrailles de monsieur," prepared the audience for what followed in a later scene. And with Gallic frankness—for the audience was largely French—they laughed to the extreme of hilarity over the unmistakable activities of Argan, when "le petit clyster insinuatif" declared itself and put him to flight. One touch of nature makes the whole world kin.

The distinctive differences in the sets of our three—or now four; for the present, anyway—little theatres are very marked. Ferrier's setting was as French as French could be. Surely those pictures and cabinets came from France; and the play was given with full heed to the French tradition by a man who was trained in the school for it.

They even gave—although for the first night only, I believe—the farcical induction of Argan into the dignities of duly accredited doctorhood. Argan was rich, and they had two solemn maids within constant call to wait upon him by inches in time to music. And even the madcap Toinette was a clothes-horse for him, although she would as soon whack him with his staff as hold it for him.

This representation of the last comedy Molière wrote is one of the very best done at La Gaité Française. The company has now been under Mr. Ferrier's tutelage long enough to have had its angles smoothed off. The cast was well selected, Mr. Ferrier enriching the rôle of the hypochondriac with those innumerable touches a trained comedian has at his finger's end that enables him to roll up the hilarity of the audience like a snowball.

Yvonne du Parc, although her French is rather thick, was so gay in spirit and so free in fun as to make Toinette an able assistant to Mr. Ferrier's comedy. Mme. Garde gave a good representation of Argan's silky and treacherous spouse, and Mr. Frediani as the amiable and sweetly lyric suitor, Mr. Baron as the ridiculous Thomas, G. Lechten as the infuriated Purgon, and a host of others re-

THE SEQUOIA LITTLE THEATRE.

It is doubtful whether there is, as yet, need for another little theatre in San Francisco, but whether there is or not, there is sure to be, some time, some opening in the theatrical world that will eagerly absorb the energies of the young director of the Sequoia.

Without financial backing or helpful partnership Miss Ruth Brenner is carrying the burden on her young shoulders. Designing the costumes and sets, coaching the players, she is really accomplishing the amazing feat of putting on two performances weekly at the Sequoia without going stony broke. Nothing is pretentious, but she contrives effects; as, for instance, the backgrounds to the Oriental pantomime "The Shepherd in the Distance," which she painted on drops of unbleached muslin.

Animated by the progressive spirit of the day, Miss Brenner belongs to that devoted band of youth which started the "little theatre" movement. Her idea is to make the Sequoia a sort of dramatic laboratory, in which local talent is to be tried and tested.

Probably Southern California will get her eventually; unless, during this period of her high and holy enthusiasm, some big hotel management doesn't grab her and harness her energies to entertaining its floating population with the one-act pieces which compose her programmes.

This month she gives James Bugge's "The Bowery," which is not particularly a dramatic stage picture, more than a playlet, of New York types, in which Mariana Gaiette played with hearty emphasis; "The Altar Candle," medieval in flavor and picturesquely enshrining the Rosetti-like beauty of Peggy Shafer, immature though promising in acting, but, in her costume and coiffeur of antique style, looking like the blessed damozel, and "The Shepherd in the Distance," the pantomime already mentioned, in which the talent of the director for designing sets and costumes was so evident. The young players presented the poetic novelty expressively and gracefully enough, and showed intelligence in following out the lead of their director. Altogether there were about two dozen young amateurs in the casts of the three pieces.

The Columbia Theatre.

Oliver Morosco's latest comedy of youth, "Wait Till We're Married," comes to the Columbia Theatre for a two weeks' engagement, commencing Monday, January 30th. "Wait Till We're Married," by Hutcheson Boyd and Rudolph Bunner, is described as being a domestic comedy of the most wholesome sort. A worldly-wise maiden sets her affections upon a severely-bred youth of the most humble means, who has been reared by two maiden aunts. In the course of his education for the position of husband to the butterfly lady the two reverse viewpoints in ludicrous fashion. The comedy was written for laughs from beginning to end and is highly modern in theme.

The original company which presented this comedy at the Playhouse in New York has been kept intact. Headed by Terry Duffy, who has been acclaimed by Eastern theatre-goers as the greatest interpreter of Irish characterization in the last generation, the typical Morosco cast includes the following carefully selected company of players: Ted W. Gibson, Barbara Brown, Mary Hill, Marie Van Tassel, Fanny Yantis, Andrew Arbuckle, William Austin, and Maxwell Paley.

The Maitland Playhouse.

"The Gay Lord Quex," by Arthur Wing Pinero, the talented author of "Mixed Marriages," opens next Monday night at the Maitland and will continue for the week. It is the first Pinero play to be staged at the Stockton Street house and for that reason holds a double interest for those who appreciate worth-while plays.

John Hare made the title-role in "The Gay Lord Quex" famous in his London appearance and the part will not fall short in the hands of Arthur Maitland, who will assume the part for the San Francisco performance. Pinero stands high in the world of letters, and "The Gay Lord Quex" is typical of his ability.

There will be two matinées as usual, one Tuesday afternoon and one on the closing Saturday.

"Jane Clegg," by St. John Ervine, one of the most widely-discussed plays of the day, highly praised by the critics who have seen the performance, is the bill this week, and will continue until Saturday night, when the closing performance will be given.

The Orpheum.

William Gaxton is a light comedian who has been successful on both the vaudeville and the legitimate stage. When Douglas Fairbanks left vaudeville for the movies it was William Gaxton who replaced him in the principal rôle of "A Regular Business Man." Mr. Gaxton has always gone to the best authors for his vehicle. "Kisses," his present production, is the work of S. Jay Kaufman of the staff of the New York Evening Globe. Gaxton is a native of San Francisco.

Madeline and Dorothy Cameron are co-headliners with William Gaxton next week. With the assistance of Grant McKay at the piano, the Cameron Sisters present one of the most striking offerings of the season. Their good looks and striking costumes are a feature of their act. In each of their costume changes are to be found novel fashions of extreme design.

Al Lydell and Carleton Macy are clever character comedians. Both have delineated characterizations in various skits and plays, but they are now appearing together for the first time. They are playing a little comedy with musical trimmings called "Old Cronies," by John I. McGowan.

For several years Dane Claudius and Lillian Scarlet have been away from the varieties. During this period they were features of "Happy Days," Hippodrome, New York. They are now back in vaudeville offering a new version of their old idea. They call it "The Call of the 'Sixties.'" Claudius and Scarlet conjure up the days that are gone in melody. Al Wohlman is a twentieth-century monologist who makes everybody laugh. His songs and stories are a volley of laughs. Mr. Wohlman was formerly with the Fanchon and Marco Revue.

The Five-Avalons are wizards of the double wires. They introduce a variety of difficult feats at lightning speed and go from one hair-raising stunt to another with scarcely room for a breath between. They are jazz athletes. They dance and play and sing and skip about over the tiny wives with as much assurance as if on solid ground.

Remaining to delight their audiences for a second week Eddie Buzzell and company in "A Man of Affairs" and Nat Nazaro with Buck and Bubbles in their delightful comedy will round out what promises to be an exceptional Orpheum bill.

It is officially announced that the Nobel Committee of the Norwegian Storting has divided the Nobel Peace Prize in equal parts between M. Branting, the Swedish prime minister, and M. Lange, the secretary-general of the Inter-Parliamentary Union.

GERMAN PROSPERITY.

Robert Crozier Long has for some months been sending from Berlin highly instructive articles concerning German finance and industry (says the New York Times). Avoiding economic theory and drenching themselves in the facts of the markets and the exchanges, they have contained a great deal of accurate information, presented without color or bias. In the Fortnightly for December, Mr. Long publishes his latest summary of financial and commercial developments in Germany. He takes up and analyzes the current paradox: "Germany is marching headlong to bankruptcy, and Germans—at least the industrial-commercial classes—are marching to unexampled prosperity."

It is impossible even to epitomize here the array of statistics presented by Mr. Long, but his general conclusions may be stated. They are:

1. That the currency depreciation is ruining the state finances.
2. That the industrial prosperity is not the result of currency depreciation, . . . but of violent fluctuations in exchange.
3. That the prosperity does not consist mainly in increasing the national wealth, but in transferring wealth from one class of citizens to another; and that the increase in exports is an unpaid-for transfer of German national wealth to foreign buyers.

Going into detail, Mr. Long shows that German ordering of raw materials from abroad has "almost entirely ceased." Industry is living merely from stocks on hand. There will soon be "no possibility of paying for foreign materials." As for the high dividends declared by many German manufacturing corporations, Mr. Long asserts that they exist mostly on paper, and are paid on paper, with the result that actual profits are, "as a whole, lower than before the war." The shareholder who now draws a 30 per cent. dividend is "really much worse off than he was when drawing 10 per cent. before the war." There is, it is true, one road to wealth open to Germans. This is by having or acquiring debts. The ease with which they can be liquidated at an enormous discount makes them a valuable asset. As a matter of fact, "the price-rise automatically expropriates bondholders, creditors, and the fixed-income classes."

Such an informed and documented study of the actual conditions in Germany should help to restore sane views. There has been feverish manufacturing and buying and selling in Germany for many months, but the movement has been artificial and unwholesome and can not last. The established laws of currency and of trade have not been, as some have vainly imagined, repealed in Germany. Their operation has been temporarily obscured by wild inflation and what is called the "catastrophe boom." But in the end they are certain to reassert themselves. Unless Germany pulls herself up, she will find herself going into the financial abyss into which Russia has fallen. The Soviet government has carried the paper money delusion to its logical conclusion, and has destroyed, not only the value of money, but credit and industry.

Methuselah Himself.

The French press has been concerned with Djouro Chemdine, who is said to be 164 years old (says the New York Tribune).

"Is it possible," Parisians ask, "to reach such an age?"

The reason for believing it true is that Djouro Chemdine is a native of Turkey, where centenarians abound. Perhaps the Orientals owe this privilege to the filial respect which is one of their virtues and which most religions have always made a passport to long life.

Unfortunately, however, according to Le Journal Débats, this reason for believing is also a reason for doubting. Precisely because he is a Turk, M. Djouro Chemdine seems liable to a forgetfulness of his age. The civil administration in his country differs from him himself in that it is still in its infancy, and the records are kept there with an irregularity which formerly must have been even worse than at present. The custom survives of referring to the age of individuals to the reign of the khalif under which they were born, a way of counting very indefinite when the khalif has ruled a dozen lustrums or more. The same is true of all the peoples of the East. One day in Cairo a traveler, who visited a mosque under the amiable conduct of a learned official who spoke French as a Parisian, saw his guide approach a robust old man who wore a green turban and so fresh looking that one would not have thought him more than sixty-eight years of age.

"He is over 130 years old," said the obliging official to the tourist. "And how do they know?" "He recites from memory the list of the sultans for the last one and a half centuries."

This by no means indicates that reports of great longevity can never be true. Many persons will be astonished when they are told that the prelate who baptized Napoleon III had been rocked on the knees of a daughter-in-law of Charles IX. And yet it is the exact truth; such having been the case of Cardinal de Belloy, Archbishop of Paris. Dead in 1808, a few years after the baptism of the future emperor, he was born in 1709 under Louis XV, and had known when a child Françoise de Narbonne, who died in 1715, the widow of Charles d'Angouleme, the son of Charles IX, and Marie Touchet. The duke had married her when she was very young, he himself then being seventy-one years old.

Returns and Payments of Taxes.

An interesting pamphlet has recently been issued for distribution by John F. Cunningham, manager of the Crocker Safe Deposit Vaults, giving schedule of dates for returns and payments of Federal and California state and county taxes for 1922.

While proceeding from Shanghai to Hong-kong recently the steamer Kwanglee, belonging to the China Steam Navigation Company, was boarded by pirates. The captain and all the European officers were held as prisoners in the engineers' messroom. The pirates then proceeded to "clean up" the Kwanglee, ransacking the passengers' belongings and forcing open the strongroom. The booty was loaded into a fishing junk, which was commandeered for the purpose, and the pirates escaped with valuables worth about $100,000, after disabling the vessel's engine. One Chinese passenger was killed.

Any one who doubts the existence of a law of compensation need only observe the curve taken by fashion designing in the last few months. In proportion as the women adopt masculine attire, the men tend toward effeminate and attenuated effects. To be sure, both these parabolas are as yet chiefly show window manifestations. But it is a horrible warning anyway that should be taken in time. It is a pity that all the world can not go peacefully trousered. No gentleman would begrudge the comfort of bifurcated clothes to any woman. But in consideration of the relentless law that governs these things we are making an appeal to all women. Would it not be better for them to sacrifice a comfort, that they have, after all, gotten along very well without throughout historic times—rather than degrade man, whose heritage is comfort anyway, to the horrible future that the haberdashers' and tailors' displays now hold for us. Surely any woman, no matter how selfish, will sacrifice her knickers to save any man, no matter how degenerate, from an empire waistline and satin pipings, which latter, say the designers' association, "add to the general joyousness of the effect." And to think that it was for this that the world was made safe and a war was fought.

The short skirt is said to be definitely entrenched. For at least another season we are slated by fashion to enjoy the aspect of calves shapely and otherwise. For a while the American woman wavered. Habit is powerful and her habit has been to obey the decrees of the Parisian dressmaker. And as for not following the fashions displayed by our own shops and fashion shows—the idea was heresy. But vanity has proved stronger than habit. The short skirt, argues the American woman, lends one a factitious youth. And youth, as all the world knows, is woman's most prized possession. Why, no one knows. It is the youthening effect of bobbed hair that has made the style universal—neither its utility nor its becomingness. For it is unbecoming to almost all the sex, who needs, strange to say, all the additional margin of fluffiness and decorations that it can surround itself with. And where is the woman who has ever adopted a style because it was utilitarian? No, we contend, it is because bobbed hair and short skirts make their wearers feel youthful. And that is half the game.

Our distinguished visitor at the Conference, Lord Riddell, has gone on record as a unique American traveler. He is unique in reporting us with unstinted praise and in discovering, moreover, our national politeness. In fact he performed the latter feat before we had ourselves. We are used to unstinted praise of ourselves within the borders of our native land, but even we ourselves have never claimed to be the politest people alive, which title Lord Riddell now so graciously claims for us. The New York Times in commenting on this unexpected national windfall is distinctly cynical. The Times goes so far as to impute an unnatural and unnative courtesy on the part of those sections of the country who entertained the Conference visitors. Says the New York Times with sinister meaning: "Lord Riddell's examples of onrushing courtesy invite our question, but do not altogether 'abide' it. In his hotel restaurant he observed a legend: 'The customer is always right.' Thus, if one orders ham and eggs, but changes his mind and tells the waiter he ordered sausages, the waiter scrapes and smiles and retrieves the sausages. 'In the old days,' observed Lord Riddell, referring beyond question to four weeks ago, 'the waiter would have told the customer to go to the least desirable of places. Nowadays, there is every effort to treat him with tact.' Skeptics will note, however, that the effort originates with the proprietor, whose relations with the customer are purely fiscal, and are carried on by employees who have a similar relation with the proprietor. Even in that high-sounding adjuration, 'The voice with a smile wins,' the idea of gain is ultimate and emphatic. Lord Riddell went on to say that in America there is an absence of the air of mystery. 'Everything is apparently very obvious.' True; it is apparently." We should like to accept our noble Britisher's estimate of us, but the poison of the Times' insinuations sinks deep. The old days of barbarity according to the leading paper of the cosmopolis are no further distant than last November and will shortly be upon us again when the company is gone and we can settle comfortably down to our domestic squabbles.

Synthetic Beauty.

The announcement that a Japanese scientist named Mikimoto has perfected an artificial pearl that can not be distinguished from the genuine is far less significant than the accompanying news that already there is a falling off in the demand for pearls in the markets of the world (says the Portland Oregonian). It might be expected that a process giving promise of largely increased production would have its effect on prices, which would only be in pursuance of a natural law, but the point is not that prices have slumped, but that somehow the pearl seems to have lost its pristine beauty because of some faint prospect that the time may come when pearls will be within the reach of all.

Of course the thing that all may possess for the asking will be wanted by no one. We know all that there is to be known about the chaste, intrinsic beauty of pearls, which are regarded by many as leaving even the diamond in the shade, but we are less able to fathom the workings of the human mind. The desire for ownership is desire to possess, not beauty, but distinction, and the latter consists in having something that other people have not. If the streets were paved with diamonds, the diamond would be as beautiful as ever, but it would be only a cobblestone—or perhaps it is that the diamond would no longer be beautiful, since beauty is a matter of the manner in which we regard it. It is so with other things than gems; in furs we see the same principle reflected, and in some rare books and articles that collectors prize for other virtues than their merit alone.

The new pearl is said to defy detection, except by examination involving its destruction, and of course it will give no satisfaction to any one to discover that his jewels were genuine after they have been smashed to bits. But we may well inquire into the reasons why we value some things above others, and perhaps in this way arrive at a sounder sense of relative values. There are plenty of beauties around us, not all of which are inordinately expensive, and our lives would be all the happier if we were able to cultivate appreciation of the fine things that are within the reach of all.

It appears that Henry II, when preparing for the marriage of his sister in 1559, first had the idea for silk hose, and that at that epoch-making event was the first to wear knitted silk stockings. A hundred years later one Hindes established a factory for stockings in the Bois de Boulogne. This was the first factory in France. It was a success from the start, and when it received protection from the ministers it became a gold mine. In 1666 the venture was turned into a company. From it arose the society of stocking makers. At this time ribbed stockings were made in England, but it was not until nearly a century later that such wear was introduced into France. The idea caught on and factories were established in Paris and Lyons.—Kansas City Star.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

Mrs. O. H. P. Belmont was entertaining the leaders of the National Woman's Party at her Newport residence. "I met a movie man the other day," she said. "He urged me to help him banish the movie censor. He declared: 'The movies need no censor, madam. They are the very backbone of American art.' The last movie I attended," I said, "it seemed to be that there was a little too much backbone in evidence."

Down in Texas the short cotton crop forced a large number of country negroes to the cities. One of these applied for a job at one of the large employment agencies. "There's a job open at the Eagle Laundry," said the man behind the desk. "Want it?" The applicant shifted uneasily from one foot to the other. "Tell you how it is, boss," he said finally. "I sure does want a job mighty bad, but de fack is, I aint never washed a eagle."

Witnesses are indeed important things in a trial, although Brother Jones occasionally finds it convenient to dispense with them in the daily course of business. Said the judge to Brother Jones: "You are charged with stealing nine of Colonel Henry's hens last night. Have you any witnesses?" "Nusah," said Brother Jones humbly; "I 'specks I 'se sawtuh peculiar dat-uh-way, but it aint nevah been mah custom to take witnesses along when I goes out chicken-stealing, suh."

A gambler named George used to visit a Chinaman's place and smoke opium almost daily. One day he rushed in and said excitedly, "Hip, loan me $10. Thanks, I'll come in with it tomorrow noon, if I'm alive!" And out he went with the money. About 3 o'clock the next afternoon a friend of the gambler dropped in on the Chinaman and said: "Hip, where is George today?" The confiding Celestial wiped his eyes with the corner of his blouse and replied: "George, him dead."

Charles M. Schwab said at a dinner in his native Loretto: "All men owe their success in great part to their wives. The more successful a man is, the readier is he to acknowledge this truth. Two brothers, a shabby and a spruce one, sat on an ocean pier. 'Why the dickens,' said the shabby brother, 'do you let your wife tell people that she made a man of you? You never heard my wife say such a thing as that.' 'No,' answered the spruce brother, 'but I've heard her say she tried her hardest.'"

The proprietors of two livery stables situated alongside each other in a busy street have been having a lively advertising duel lately. The other day one of them stuck up on his office window a long strip of paper bearing the words: "Our horses need no whip to make them go." This bit of sarcasm naturally caused some amusement at the expense of the rival proprietor, but in less than an hour he neatly turned the tables by pasting the following retort in his own window: "True. The wind blows them along!"

A married wit who displays his gift of repartee at the expense of his wife is not to be admired, however telling his sally. This story of Lord Sherbrook is to the point. He remarked that it was absurd for a man to say, "With all my worldly goods I thee endow," when he had none. "For instance, when I married I had not a shilling with which to endow my wife." "But you had your brains, Bob," said his wife from across the table. "But nobody, my dear, could say that I endowed you with those," he retorted.

Sir Auckland Geddes, the British ambassador, said the other day at an art exhibition: "Winston Churchill paints, you know. He writes as well, but painting is his latest hobby. He's a good painter, too, though his friends joke him a great deal about it. He stayed not long ago at Dunrobin Castle with the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland, and after he was gone the duchess said: 'Mr. Churchill is so original. He spent all his time while here painting one of the castle towers. He is gone now. I am so glad he took his picture with him.'"

During an examination in an English school the inspector began to question the pupils on punctuation, when the mayor, a pompous individual, interrupted with the remark, "It is foolish to bother about commas and such-like." The inspector flushed angrily, and turning to one of the boys he bade him write on the blackboard, "The mayor of Cheesington says the inspector is a fool. Now," he continued, "put a comma after Cheesington and another after inspector." The boy did so, and the mayor kept quiet after that.

The inhabitants of a small village at last got a postoffice, with the grocer for postmaster, and their pride in their acquisition was at first unbounded. When complaints began to come in that letters were not being sent off, the Postoffice Department sent an inspector to investigate. "What becomes of the letters posted here?" the inspector demanded. "The people say they are not being sent off." "Of course they aint," was the response as the grocer pointed to a large and nearly empty mail sack hanging in a corner. "Aint sent it off because it aint anywheres near full yet."

John Charley Chepson was a new member of the American Press Humorists' Association, and at the convention in Philadelphia his loud laugh was heard above everything when some speaker pulled a gag that Chepson liked. After two days of public luncheons and dinners at which this boisterous laugh had attracted almost as much attention as the comic speeches themselves, the veterans decided to spring a practical joke on the unsophisticated Chepson. They passed the word that Chepson was to be called on suddenly for a speech, and at his first attempt to be funny, the plotters were to laugh in a concerted roar that would break up the meeting. Chepson arose and said: "For two days I have been industriously laughing my head off at every chestnut and feeble gag pulled by the officers of this association in the hope that I would curry favor with them and they would call on me for a speech. But I wore myself out before I bought their favor, and I am now too exhausted to talk. Thank you." And he sat down. The plotters were dumfounded. In fact, Chepson's loud laughter had been sincere. But he was witty enough to foresee that they were loaded for him and that he must spike their guns.

THE MERRY MUSE.

Complex.

I have a Freudian complex,
A funny little complex,
That's lurking in the hinterland
Of my subconscious brain;
It's rightfully perplexing,
And really rather vexing;
I half suspect, to tell the truth,
It's driving me insane.

It's not an inhibition,
Nor yet a prohibition,
But be assured it's troublesome
As either one could be.
Indeed it's so annoying
I know it is destroying
The very small intelligence
The gods vouchsafed to me.

Why I'm so much annoyed
Is, before I studied Freud,
I never knew a thing about
These complexes at all:
But since they are in season,
I'll have mine or know the reason,
Though the up-keep on a complex
Is a figure to appall.

—Ben Ray Redman in Harper's Magazine.

The Royal Wedding.

Princess Mary's wedding date is said to have been definitely set for February 28th at 2 o'clock in the afternoon. Among other announcements is the list of bridesmaids, which is as follows: Princess Maud, younger daughter of the Princess Royal; Lady Rachel Cavendish, fourth daughter of the Duke and Duchess of Devonshire; Lady Mary Thynne, youngest daughter of the Marquis of Bath; Lady Victoria Mary Cambridge, elder daughter of the Marquis of Cambridge; Lady Doris Gordon-Lennox, youngest daughter of the Earl of March; Lady Elizabeth Rows-Lyon, youngest daughter of the Earl of Strathmore; Lady Diana Brydeman, eldest daughter of the Earl of Bradford, and Lady May Cambridge, only daughter of the Earl of Athelone. The ceremony is to be held in Westminster Abbey and the occasion will be the first in 640 years to celebrate the wedding of a daughter of the sovereign in the historic abbey. The marriage will take place in the sanctuary, the bridal procession dividing to pass on either side of the grave of the "Unknown Warrior." Seats are being erected in the nave to accommodate 2000 spectators.

The movement to collect immense sums from British cities for royal wedding gifts has been stopped by the princess, who requests that money collected for this purpose be used for charity and unemployment funds. The city of London has been limited to a one-thousand-dollar present. The Marys of the Empire are collecting $60,000 for their gift, half of which is to be devoted to hospitals.

The average movie hero is in pretty bad shape along in the middle of the third reel, and it takes two more reels to get him out. That's why so many photoplays would be more satisfactory if the last two reels were dispensed with. And that's why many discerning movie goers are seen walking out at the end of the third reel. They have seen the hero land just where they want him, and by walking out, leave him there.—Kansas City Star.

Ostentatious meekness is another form of egotism.—Baltimore Evening Sun.

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

Cycol will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

For Relief of Famine-Stricken Jews.

For the purpose of aiding Jews in war and famine districts of Europe, Jews in San Francisco are uniting under Moses A. Gunst, regional chairman for California, Washington, Oregon, Arizona, and Nevada, in a campaign to raise $350,000 of the $1,400,000 asked by the American Jewish Relief Committee in its nation-wide effort.

The committee will carry aid to more than 200,000 Jewish war orphans in Poland and Russia. A revolving fund to be loaned through a credit system whereby stricken families and individuals receiving funds may return the sums at low rates of interest will be established. Clothes are to be bought in this country for delivery on the other side to those whose frail bodies weakened by exposure to rough weather, are in dire need of bodily warmth.

Trade schools will be opened in many provinces and adults and children will be taught to do something to help tide them over the general crisis that has overtaken them. Economic rehabilitation for Jewish refugees will be sought and cultural work, "that the spiritual part of them may not die," will form a part of the relief programme. Sanitation and medical relief will be carried into districts where great suffering exists as an aftermath of war and famine.

Three noted speakers, including David A. Brown, national campaign director; Jacob Bilikopf, formerly relief worker under John R. Mott with the A. E. F., and Dr. Boris H. Bogen, who has been head of the committee's work in Europe, will arrive in San Francisco Sunday to be present and speak at the inaugural campaign dinner to be held that evening at the Hotel St. Francis.

With Gunst on the local executive committee are Mortimer Fleishhacker, Mrs. I. W. Hellman, Jr., Sidney Ehrman, Alfred I. Esberg, Rabbi Martin A. Meyer, and Mrs. Max Sloss.

In charge of the women's work are Mrs. Marcus Koshland and Mrs. Albert L. Ehrman.

The campaign has received both the approval and the commendation of President Harding and Herbert Hoover and a number of state governors have endorsed it.

Switzerland's Example

Gold exports are now so unusual that attention is challenged when a country so small in commercial importance as Switzerland can command our resources. Other countries have credits with us on the exchange of goods, but in no other are the currency conditions similar. For the eleven months ended with November we exported to Switzerland $41,482,000 and imported $54,831,000. On the goods movement we owe Switzerland over $13,000,000. Switzerland is so far from wanting the gold that she already has an excess. All countries need gold, but most countries have an excess of currency. Gold comes here because there is no other place for it to go as money, and because our price level is the world's lowest, as is customary in a gold standard country as compared with paper money countries. Our gold goes to Switzerland as a commodity, not as money.

There is no reason why we should regret its loss in inconsiderable sums, but if we should wish to keep it here the method would be to reduce the price of our goods so that they would be more attractive to Switzerland and we should owe her nothing on balance. This illustrates the classical manner in which the exchanges are corrected. Countries which have an exportable currency lose it when the exchanges are against them, and when they lose enough they reduce the price level of their goods until they are cheaper to buy than the exportable currency. On the other hand, when the exchanges are so excessive that too much importable currency is sent the price level is raised, so that fewer goods will be bought. The export and the import of the only exportable and importable international currency, gold, is the only manner in which it is positively known whether the exchanges should be corrected by alteration of the price level. Thus the movements in exchange are directly related to international price levels, and both are controlled by the discount rate, which works by making credit cheaper or dearer and influencing costs of production and distribution.—New York Times.

Principle Before Policy.

In last week's Argonaut there appeared a letter from one George Swanson, "member of Lorenz Post No. 11, Mankato, Minnesota"—a letter curiously marked by mental confusion on the part of the writer. Among other more or less "smart" remarks Mr. Swanson twits the Argonaut thusly: "In two instances now you have lined yourself against a nation-wide movement and lost out. I refer to the Maternity bill and the Adjusted Compensation (bonus) bill." Our young friend evidently fails to comprehend the Argonaut's inspiration in dealing with public matters. Both his citations, let us admit, are true. And the losing out was not only before, but after the fact. In presenting its views the Argonaut is concerned not one ding-dang whether it "wins" or "loses" out. It is not that kind of a journal. Very definitely devoted to principles, it assumes responsibility for no causes. It speaks its mind with entire freedom, win or lose. It stands by principle and as readily declares its views with respect to movements destined to "lose out" as to those destined to win. There was once a candidate for the presidency of the United States who prior to election day made a declaration that was directly calculated to lose votes. He justified his course by the remark that he would rather be right than be President. In its modest way, the Argonaut steers its course by this sentiment. It would rather be right and "lose out" than win by a policy of pandering. If the Argonaut shall ever so far abandon its traditions and make sacrifice of principles to take on a "policy"—if it shall adjust its judgments and opinions upon calculation of "winning out"—it will have ceased to be the Argonaut.

Germany's Industrial Revival.

While the European countries that won the war languish, Germany, which lost the war, flourishes under an amazing revival of her industries. Concrete evidence in exposition of German conditions was given last week by Mr. Carl Ackerman in an address before a group of advertising men in New York. Having just returned from a tour of observation in Germany, Mr. Ackerman was able to speak from personal knowledge. Germany, he said, has not only recovered, but is pushing her business competitors back almost into the slough of despond in which she herself floundered three years ago. The story of how this has been accomplished is worth attention.

Immediately after the war the German government issued 127,000,000,000 of paper marks, of which 92,000,000,000 were taken by speculative investors outside of Germany. In payment for these scraps of paper there flowed into Germany a prodigious stream of actual money. It was used to bring in raw materials for old factories which had long been idle and for new ones equipped from loot drawn from Belgium and northern France. German labor is paid in marks, and while wage rates as measured by marks are far in advance of old schedules, if measured in gold are less than half of the rates paid in England, and of course infinitely less than American wage rates. German workmen paid in a depreciated currency are thus being automatically exploited. They are giving to the German manufacturer an "edge" of fully 50 per cent. over employing manufacturers of countries with which Germany is in close competition.

Within the year 1921 nineteen billion shares of new industrial securities were sold. German purchases of cotton from this country within the year ran to double the figures of any previous year. Similarly with copper and many other raw materials. In the year German steamships did an unprecedented volume of business between the British ports and North and South America, bringing in raw materials and carrying out finished products.

Schedules of comparative prices challenge belief. German manufacturers make automobile parts and sell them in Detroit cheaper than the Detroit manufacturers can make them. German manufacturers can place lawn-mowers in the New York market for less than one-third of their cost in any American factory. They can sell a camera tripod in New York at a profit for less than the cost of the raw material for the same article here. A meter which wholesales in America for eight dollars sells at wholesale in Germany for one dollar and a half. Shears which retail in Germany for fourteen cents sell in the Mississippi Valley for three dollars. And so on ad infinitum—clocks, phonographs, ten-ton engines. Germany can and does undersell both American and British manufacturers in every country that is open to her commerce.

The labor differential is a large factor in the situation, but it is not the whole thing. Chicane plays its part. For example, a clock made in Germany bears on its dial a statement which proclaims it to have been "made in America." But it is, says Mr. Ackerman, the dial alone that is made in this country, and that keeps the article within the law. An American phonograph factory, operating in Germany, was seized by the government of that country at the beginning of the war. The new German government promptly returned to the company its factory with the machinery by which phonographs were turned out. But shortly thereafter German factories were flooding the markets of the world with records made from matrices taken from the

Mr. Ackerman declared that American investors are measurably to blame for a situation that puts American manufacturers at such serious disadvantage. It was mainly from American speculators who bought German marks by the billions that means for rehabilitation of Germany industry came. Many American factories are idle because American speculators gave to Germany the means of cut-throat competition. Mr. Ackerman's remedy for the mischief that has been done is revision of the tariff. The German economic offensive can, he argues, be met by an American valuation being placed on imported goods subject to ad valorem duties. That is, the 12 per cent. of our imports subject to such duty can be valued according to American standards rather than by those of Germany.

Mr. Ackerman's closing message is worth attention: "Throughout the war we had here a great spiritual movement, and a country united for action under a slogan which urged us to 'Keep the Home Fires Burning.' Today we need some similar recognition of the new situation. We must unite to meet this new form of aggression and increase our efforts to 'Keep the Home Stacks Smoking.'"

Petulant France.

The attitude of France in the Washington Conference, and concurrently at Cannes, and as indicated still more recently toward the projected Genoa meeting, is disconcerting. The fault with France is that she over-visualizes Germany and under-visualizes everything else. Just as M. Clemenceau at the peace conference could see nothing and would hear nothing that did not relate directly to France, now France is indifferent towards whatever does not bear a direct relation to her real or imaginary interests. Possessed by the bug-a-boo of a revengeful Germany, she insists upon maintaining a land armament a million strong. In doing this she ignores her general obligations, confuses her domestic finance by colossal issues of paper money, and moves rapidly toward the vortex of financial ruin. She seeks security through arrangements with Britain and the United States, at the same time irritating and offending these countries by insistence upon terms to which they will not or can not accede. Then she flies into a rage that tries the patience of a friendship that is a source of security—in truth her only security.

So closely are the eyes of France fixed upon her own conditions and problems that she fails to comprehend differences in her governmental structure and those of the countries that wish to maintain relations of friendship with her. She asks for formal commitments which Britain under her traditional policies will not yield and which America could not if she would. France wants a hard-and-fast alliance binding Britain and the United States to come to her defense in case of an aggressive movement on the part of Germany; and she is blind to the fact that such commitments are impossible. If France could view the situation calmly and could bring herself to understand that the arrangements which Britain and America propose to make are of potentially higher value than the demands which she herself puts forth, it would yield her happy release from the terrors that now dominate her ways of thinking and infuse elements of irritation into her foreign diplomacy.

To illustrate: In the procedures of the Washington Conference there has been developed a distinctly friendly attitude towards France on the part of all the participating nations. Among other things she has been made a party to the Four-Power Pact and is thus associated in a moral sense with Britain, America, and Japan. Directly, with respect to Pacific Ocean affairs, and inferentially in other respects as a friendly associate with these countries, France is in a morally strong position. Germany, however imbued with revengeful sentiments, is not likely to move aggressively against a country which in the recent war was associated with the Allies and which is immediately in partnership with Britain, America, and Japan. True, these countries have not promised to come to her defense in case of a German onslaught. But the fact that she stands with them is in itself a fact that Germany is not likely to overlook. But in her self-centered egotism of eye and mind France can not see this. She insists upon specific engagements, and when they are denied she gets into a panic and says and does spiteful things.

The United States never has entered into hard-and-fast alliances. That no such arrangement is possible has been very definitely demonstrated in the failure to confirm the commitments of the Versailles treaty. It would seem that France should see the point and so shape her policies as to make them accord with the inevitable. She does not see it because she shuts her eyes to facts. In the meantime she is putting upon those whose support is necessary to her security a strain, which only a species of patience, comparable to that of one who deals with a naughty child, enables them to endure.

Climate and Temperamental Warmth.

There are many illusions about the "Frozen North." One is that the climate there is excessively cold. This fallacy has been exposed by the explorer Steffansson. Another is that Northerners are "cold," in the sense of being very rational and immune from the fires of impulse that consume the children of latitudes nearer the sun. Ossian should have dispelled that. Neither sleet nor snow nor gelid wind could extinguish the ardors of the amorous Celtic heroes, whose songs and deeds were braziers that glowed the more fiercely for the northern gale, and always outflamed the languid hearth fires of the "Southrons." The cloak of convention does not cling more tightly to the forms of Northern ladies than to their more rotund sisters in the South, nor does the icy blast of Boreas make them any less ready to change it for the gossamer robes of impulse. Skeptical readers are referred to Borrow's comment on the Scotch ballads and the love letters of Burns.

Neither are their tongues less ardent and eloquent, as may be judged from recent orations of lady members in the Irish Parliament. Witness also the resonant words with which Mrs. Stillman shouts hyperbole from among the snows of her Hyperborean retreat. In New York, which is comparatively Southern, Mrs. Stillman maintains a fine verbal reserve. But in Latuque, Quebec, the gusto of the chill wind from the mountain peaks and the heady tang of the pine forests move her to indite this telegram to the sober and tongue-tied James:

Today, standing in the snow of Canada, I know what you tried to do to me, and from the North I hurl my gauntlet at your feet. Gold against courage, James, I am ready for you.

It is to be remembered, of course, that these words may have been modeled intentionally on the caption style of the movies, beloved of the masses whom it is Mrs. Stillman's pleasure to captivate. Also that being made a national figure is not conducive to verbal reticence or coherence of thought. But surely no such farrago as this was ever penned in strong sunlight.

The Spanish Invaders.

Recent dispatches from abroad affirm that the Spaniards have invaded London. A cult of things Spanish has swept over the British capital, with Belasco Ibañez in the thick of it, gathering in the loot. The success of his drama, "Blood and Sand," is the seal of London's capitulation to the new Armada.

We have grown accustomed by this time to the saying that "London has been taken by storm." The hospitality with which the grim old city by the Thames exposes herself to such assaults recalls the story of the portly French dame who, while the countryside was being sacked by a ruthless enemy, inquired in eager tones of the fugitives, "Ou viole-t-on?" And the favors of a city so determined to be captivated are apt to prove rather ephemeral.

But the wave of enthusiasm for Spain is not confined to London. Other European capitals have succumbed to the fandango and the frijole, the comedies of Calderon and the bull-fights of Belasco. One of the main causes for this is probably that Spain has not been greatly affected by the war, and the battle-torn nations are turning to her art and literature as a refuge from grim memories. She offers a kind of avenue of return to the intellectual and emotional status quo ante. Securely walled by the Pyrenees and the sea from a conflict that only served to increase her prosperity, she has lost none of her old-time serenity and laughter, and now that the strife is over, she seems to have adopted the rôle of cup-bearer to the blood-stained warriors.

One of the marks of her emotional serenity is that she still delights in tragedy and bloodshed on the stage. Not so the rest of Europe. Ibañez' play, as produced in London, has been altered to produce a happy ending. Spanish audiences can still find pleasure in a tale that mingles vivacity with violence, but her war-weary neighbors prefer their comedy straight.

It is possible that Spain has missed something through her isolation from the paroxysm that lately shook the rest of the Latin world. There may, after all, be some such a thing as an "angel of pain." But in a temporary and material sense she flourishes in unchastened splendor.

High and Dry Poincaré.

It is not surprising to learn of Premier Poincaré that when he was a small boy in school at Bar le Duc he never went out of doors without an umbrella. When friends remonstrated that it was not raining the future premier replied with unerring sagacity, "No, but it might." M. Poincaré, in fact, belongs to the type known in America as the "gum-shoer." We meet in him the man who always remembers his goloshes and tiptoes his way through life on silent rubber soles. He speaks seldom, and then only when every one else has said enough to disclose the majority idea. His public addresses are collocations of platitude, delivered with a precision and solemnity that lend them a soporific persuasiveness. When it is not possible to escape argument by silence M. Poincaré emphasizes the catch word of the moment or anæsthetizes his opponents in an ether of formless generalities. Behind all this there may be an acute intelligence at work, but if so, the evidence is misleading. To an unpartisan eye, M. Poincaré represents the anthesis of the France that has stirred the admiration and wonder of the world in the past: the gallant and courageous France, whose imagination, intellectual daring, and love of justice have made her the standard-bearer of great causes. He represents a France with which we are less familiar: France of the heavy gold watch chain and black gloves, of dreary ritualists and petty convenances, of solemn gens du bien, and funereally pompous and cautious functionaries beside whom Dickens' Gradgrind Senior and Mr. Merdle were poets of revolt.

The extraordinary support he is now receiving in France is due to a war-shaken morale that makes the majority of the French people anxious for security at all costs, and willing to exalt any official who can make a virtue of the commercial disintegration of Germany. Their concern about the inequality of the per capita tax rate in France and Germany seems to arise primarily from a fear that the restoration of financial stability in Germany will mean investing their old enemy with new sinews of war. From an economic viewpoint, however, it is obvious that the prosperity of Europe demands the rehabilitation of all Germany's industrial resources, and a policy that makes her innocuous by making her a wilderness is unworthy both of the French intelligence and of French pride. And all this can only be the result of a passing wave of hysteria. Now that the French people have assuaged their fears by electing Poincaré—who has never been a popular or a representative figure—they will probably regret the loss of Briand. But even the temporary overthrow of the latter and of his more liberal policy may involve a great loss to the world in general, which is too apt to approach such questions as if the prosperity of one nation demanded the impoverishment of another, and as if any country could escape the effects of its neighbor's ruin.

Editorial Notes.

The Rev. J. M. Van Every, an Oakland clergyman, has long made a specialty of denouncing divorce. He has preached and written volumes on the subject with a positiveness—and lack of charity—not infrequently marking the attitude of the churchman when he essays discussion of social problems. But now comes the Rev. Van Every into Judge Shortall's court in support of the plea of his daughter, Mrs. Irene Young, for divorce. Experience at close range has made the Rev.

Mr. Van Every wiser than he was. "No man," he now admits, "can say at the time the nuptial knot is tied just what the outcome will be, not even when the clergyman happens to be the father of the bride." In the concluding phrase of this admission there is a certain pathos, though we fail to discover an element of special solemnity in the fact that the ceremony was pronounced by the father of the bride.

The Rev. Mr. Van Every is not first to discover that it makes a difference whose ox is gored. For many years the late Professor Huxley waged a fight to nullify the rule of British law prohibiting marriage with a deceased wife's sister. Through his persistency the cause was ultimately won; and very shortly thereafter the surviving husband of Professor Huxley's elder daughter desired to marry a younger sister of his deceased wife. In his personal memoirs Huxley, a man of the soundest sentiment as well as of the soundest intellect, makes record of the mental agony involved in yielding consent. Verily it makes a difference whose ox is gored.

Comes the Rev. Albert W. Palmer from Honolulu with the interesting information that Japanese children in the Hawaiian Islands are "more loyal to the United States than they are to Japan." Further, that the presence of 110,000 Japanese in Hawaii out of a total population of 250,000 "does not constitute a menace." As to which Mr. Palmer's hearers would do well to take with the traditional grain of salt allowable to social observation when the observer is a clergyman. Mr. Palmer's "message," which he proposes to deliver throughout the United States, does not find confirmation at the hands of men of more practical type. In fact, he is the only man of hundreds who have assumed to render judgment in matter of Japanese population in Hawaii who holds to the opinion that there is no Japanese problem in the Islands.

It was noted recently in these columns that in the formulation of the new (and makeshift) tariff schedules the Treasury Department was represented by experts formerly employed by Secretaries McAdoo and Glass and representative of Democratic rather than of Republican ideas. Secretary Mellon was subjected to criticism on this score, and not unjustly. There was, to say the least, incongruity in the fact that a Republican tariff law should in large measure be drafted by Democratic experts. Now there has come a shake-up that is calculated to bring the organization of the Treasury Department into support of the purposes of the Administration. George A. Ashworth, a Democrat, who for the past three years has been chief of the Customs Service Division, is supplanted by Ernest W. Camp, recently secretary to Representative Fordney, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee. Elmer Dover, a Republican and a protective tariff advocate, becomes Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, taking the place of an appointee of Mr. McAdoo.

Senator Borah is entirely within bounds in the declaration that leniency on the part of the United States to her European creditors ought to be contingent upon reasonable policies on their part in the matter of domestic expenditures. Assuredly countries which can not pay their debts, or even the interest upon them, have no right in morals to spend enormous sums of money in maintenance of military establishments. They have no right in business morals or in any other kind of morals to still further augment the chaos of the times by colossal issues of worthless paper money which they spend without judgment or conscience to their own discredit and in contempt of their obligations. The United States is not only a reasonable creditor, but it wishes to be a generous one. But a policy so extravagantly generous as to encourage, if not directly promote, ruinous policies on the part of the European countries is neither wise nor in the last analysis considerate. In international relations, as in individual relations, it is the right of the creditor to insist that debtors shall exercise a reasonable degree of prudence before asking further favors.

Senator John Sharp Williams insists that Belgium's obligation to the United States for funds advanced by this country during the war shall stand on a basis different from the debts due us from other countries. Reason and sentiment combine to justify this demand.

Belgium's great part in the war was that of a break-water. If she had not by tremendous sacrifices, with heroic endurance of incomparable cruelties, stood against the advancing hordes in August, 1914, France would have been overrun, Paris would have fallen, and the war might have had a different termination. The moral heroism of Belgium at the beginning of the war saved the civilized world from the greatest of catastrophes. Subsequently the United States advanced to Belgium several millions of dollars, partly to save her people from starvation, partly to aid their activities in prosecution of the war. Senator Williams wants to sponge out this debt; and we believe the sentiment of the people of the United States will support the proposal. Belgium, in respect of her service and her sufferings, in view of her poverty, is entitled, not only to sympathy, but to generosity. Not even by relieving her of obligation on the score of moneys advanced shall we return to her that which she gave to us in the fateful months of 1914.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

The Submarine Again.

NAVAL WAR COLLEGE,
NEWPORT, R. I., January 20, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: In your issue of January 7, 1922, appeared an article entitled "England and the Submarine," in which, I have no doubt, your political conclusions were sound. They generally are.

But there were many serious technical errors. This is not to be wondered at because the country does not take kindly to the "now it can be told" information when that information conflicts with preconceived ideas and induces disturbing mental effort. The plain fact is, however, that our policies are in grave danger of being based upon misinformation. This is likely to lead to serious results. For example, your article stated what the whole nation approves and concedes—the necessary inhumanity of undersea warfare. This is a widespread and extraordinary misconception. The plain facts are that no such generalization can be made. It depended largely upon the type of submarine used and the conditions under which it was employed. The cruiser type, for example, rarely departed from strict observation of the laws governing warfare upon the seas. Moreover, recent developments tend to make the more humane practice almost mandatory. Inhuman practices arose, not from the nature of the submarine as a weapon, but from:

1. The peculiar strategic and geographic situation in European waters, and
  2. A peculiar German conception of war and the consequently peculiar policy adopted to conform to that conception. To proceed to explanation and proof:
- European waters, and particularly the area affected by the war, are generally close waters. That is to say, Europe is a comparatively small area geographically, the coast is very irregular, and the states are small. The adjacent seas are of no great extent and the distance between naval bases is short. This enables combatants to operate short-radius craft. The results were:

1. That in these waters the smaller types of submarines could operate, and
  2. That anti-submarine craft were generally within easy calling distance of an attacked ship.
- Now the first of the above considerations meant that submarines that had to depend solely upon the torpedo could also be used. This type could often be avoided if it gave warning, because it had no speed. Even the larger 800-ton class, when ships became armed, could frequently be driven off or sunk. Moreover, the delay caused by giving warning was often sufficient to enable anti-submarine craft to reach the scene and drive off or destroy the attacker. Hence the sinkings without warning.

I shall not go into detail regarding the second aspect: the German theory of terrorism—that is too well known—beyond stating that it was common to both land and sea warfare and frequently achieved substantial results, as in the case of Belgium, where it enabled the German army to occupy and hold the country with a minimum number of troops and with complete security to its communications. This released larger numbers for active operations. I do not justify this policy; I state facts.

But when the Germans attacked merchant ships in open waters and when they used their powerful and speedy cruiser submarines they generally gave warning and acted in a humane manner. According to Admiral Sims' letter to the New York Times of January 8, 1922, their usual method of procedure was to capture a ship, put a prize crew aboard, use it as a floating base, transfer to it the passengers and crews of ships subsequently sunk and, when it was full, release the ship to proceed to port.

Unfortunately I can not give precise examples of this procedure; I can only give the following data:

September, 1917, Norwegian S. S. Bygdones captured. 1917, Eagle Wing halted, stores taken, and the skipper rebuked for being behind his schedule, warned never again to keep a U-boat waiting, and told to "beat it."

1918, Willie G captured and used to take the crew and that of the Eric to port.

1918, Triumph, Canadian, captured, armed as a raider, and used to sink American fishing ships.

But that there existed a marked contrast between methods used in close waters and those in open waters the following statistics, the only ones at hand, will prove. They were compiled by a United States Navy officer during the war and apply to the month of September, 1917:

| Area.                   | Sunk by Torpedo. | Sunk by Gun. |
|-------------------------|------------------|--------------|
| Atlantic . . . . .      | 34               | 65           |
| North Sea . . . . .     | 19               | 7            |
| Channel . . . . .       | 30               | 16           |
| Mediterranean . . . . . | 21               | 16           |
|                         | 124              | 104          |

The few submarines which operated off our coast in 1918 destroyed exactly 100 ships, as follows:

|--|-----|
| Captured, boarded, and sunk by bombs . . . . . | 60  |
| Sunk by gunfire . . . . .                      | 15  |
| Torpedoed . . . . .                            | 15  |
| Sunk by mines . . . . .                        | 5   |
| Sunk by gunfire and bomb . . . . .             | 2   |
| Burned . . . . .                               | 2   |
|  | 100 |

Cases of inhuman or brutal methods were negligible.

The U-140 carried a special prize crew. What for?

In 1918 the Germans built eight new cruising submarines. These were no "spit-boxes." They were of about 2700 tons, had 18 knots surface speed, carried six-inch guns, crews of over 100—enough to provide a prize crew—and had a radius of 20,000 miles. Such craft are cruisers. They operate in all respects as surface cruisers with one exception, and that renders them more effective than surface cruisers for commerce destruction: they can submerge and can thus escape attack and keep the seas. They have, moreover, the advantage in speed over 95 per cent. of all merchant ships and can out-range and out-fight 99 per cent. of all armed merchantmen. Why sink without warning? To do so costs about $10,000, the price of a torpedo; to capture by threat of gunfire costs about a dollar and a half; the price of a cheap bomb and a few feet of fuse.

It may cost nothing. Money may be actually saved and other substantial advantages derived by not sinking at all. A captured ship can be used as a base, her stores used, part of the submarine crew rested and refreshed as a prize crew and their morale raised, to say nothing of the moral advantages of honorable warfare.

This is the criticism of a serious error of fact which you share with the lay opinion of the country; upon this depends an important policy.

Other statements are of minor importance. That "the war also taught England that submarine could not fight submarine" is directly contrary to the facts. The submarine was the most effective anti-submarine weapon of all, and by far. See Admiral Sims' "Victory at Sea." If that is not convincing I can supply official figures to prove it.

It is dangerous also to state that the submarine is predominantly a weapon of offense. We must not generalize from the peculiar conditions of the late war. Whether the submarine is defensive or offensive depends upon the type and the conditions under which it is used. For the United States it will probably always be predominantly a defensive weapon. There are fleet-submarines, cruiser-submarines, coast-defense-submarines, mine-laying-submarines, and monitor or battleship-submarine. Of these we have no effective fleet-submarines, few modern cruisers, and no mine-layers or monitors. We have practically only coast-defense-submarines, but it is this type which is of supreme importance to us. Fully supplied with these and with aircraft, our coasts will be practically secure from invasion by any power. Moreover, a blockade of our long coast line would be rendered impracticable. Of course such a use does not win a war; it gives no more than a stalemate. For offensive action, to crush an enemy and to impose our will for a speedy peace we need the offensive types as well. But the submarine in its defensive form is peculiarly fitted to our strategic and geographical situation.

There is a third criticism of no particular importance save to give credit where credit is due, and that is your statement that the British have no aptitude for submarine war. No service handled the submarine with greater technical skill, efficiency, and daring. The British submarine service was not heralded, as it was not the policy of the admiralty to advertise its activity. But British submarines sank three times the number of U-boats that their destroyers sank. We ought not to forget their brilliant exploits in the Baltic nor their gallant, almost foolhardy passages of the mine-strewn Dardanelles and their nervy work in the Sea of Marmora. I think that our service will concede the British to be the best of all in submarine war.

In conclusion, while one can not well escape agreeing with the political conclusions you express, nor blame you for technical errors in a subject where genuine information is scarcely to be had, I am forced to draw your attention to them because our policy ought to be founded upon the truth.

We have all too readily succumbed to Mr. Balfour's clever sentimental appeal. Unless it be Hearst—I do not know; I do not read his papers; I can not—there has not been a single voice raised in the warning "not to let the British pull the wool over our eyes," except one: that of Admiral Sims.

I do not blame the British at all for trying: theirs is a critical situation; but I do blame our people if the British succeed. J. M. SCAMMELL.

(After rereading Mr. Scammell's letter and the article to which he draws exception, I can not see that we differ on any essential point but one, and that is less a matter of fact than of opinion. All the main facts mentioned in Mr. Scammell's letter were known to me when the article was written. They are contained in two volumes published in 1919 and 1920 respectively, by C. W. Domville-Fife, Lieut. R.N.V.R., late of the staff of His Majesty's School of Submarine Mining. The first of these books has been published in America by the J. B. Lippincott Company. The later one can be obtained from G. Bell & Sons, Ltd., London. "Anti-Submarine Warfare," another volume by the same author, discussing this phase of the subject in detail, has lately been issued by the Lippincott Company and by Messrs. Seeley, Service & Co., Ltd., London. My only reference to the vexed question of the inhumanity of submarine warfare, occurred in a sentence that drew attention to the disingenuity of the British delegates in basing their objections to the submarine on this ground when their real motive was quite other. But whatever view one may take regarding the likelihood of submarine abuses in the future, there can be no question of our relinquishing this weapon while the present alignment continues, or until it becomes obsolete. On this basic point, Mr. Scammell and I are at no disagreement, and the article contains no statement which, when read in the context, subverts the policy he so ably champions.—AUBREY BOYD.)

No Bonus for This Patriot.

DAVIS, CAL., January 27, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: While not gifted of tongue and pen, I can not forbear thanking you for your remarks anent "adjusted compensation," especially as commendation is probably not plentiful.

I entirely fail to understand the state of mind which considers that because we did what any man would consider—or should consider—his duty at a time of need we should now be handed an uncalled-for and unexpected bonus.

When a man enlists in his country's defense he is fulfilling an obligation for which there can be no material recompense. If he is a patriot he desires none.

This does not apply to the men disabled in the service; nothing in their aid should be left undone and the Board for Vocational Education should receive all support and encouragement.

I would like to state that I enlisted in the army, but never left California; being discharged six months after enlistment as physically unfit for service, mainly due to a mistake in diagnosis by the doctor. ARTHUR FOLGER.

VOICES FROM THE PRESS.

THE GENOA CONFERENCE.

(New York Times, January 22)

In the discussion of participation in the Genoa Economic Conference many have lost sight of the question of what such a conference can actually accomplish. The idea that depreciated exchange rates will by some arbitrary action be "stabilized," or raised to the neighborhood of normal parity, is now pretty generally dismissed. Depreciated exchange is nothing but a symptom; the disease lies behind it, and can be cured only through eventually bringing a country's exports nearer to balance with its imports and through reducing its paper currency to normal proportions. This problem of the inflated currencies differs greatly in the different European states. England's £312,000,000 "currency notes," for instance, were not directly or indirectly put out by the government to meet a deficit. Like our own old national bank notes, they were issued to the banks on the pledge of government securities; the banks could use them only in so far as their depositors asked for them, and the increase or decrease therefore depended chiefly, as with our Federal Reserve notes, on the changing needs of trade.

The actual policy of the governments toward their currencies also differs. The British treasury notes were reduced last year £45,000,000, or about 13 per cent. France has taken up with the proceeds of government bond sales 3,000,000,000 out of the 39,000,000,000 maximum paper issues, and at the present rate of retirement would have called in the whole war issue within the next ten years. But countries such as Poland or Austria, where a huge continuing deficit is being met by new paper money, are approaching a point where their paper currencies will be worth as little as the French assignats in 1797 or the Confederate currency in 1864. Russia long ago reached and passed that point; Germany is on the way to it.

Few familiar with economic history foresee any outcome of this prodigious paper inflation in Central Europe except some form of repudiation. For the proposal of canceling the currencies outright, however, or even of scaling them down arbitrarily, no voice at present seems to be raised. Suggestions have been made for reducing the gold value of the monetary unit in which the paper notes are payable; for instance, cutting down the actual gold content of the twenty-mark piece by one-half or three-quarters and declaring by law that the new coin is the mark in which outstanding notes are redeemable. But, obviously, this is quite as much repudiation as the canceling of a ratable part of the nominal value of the outstanding paper.

Some of the more venturesome economists have gone so far as to advocate the same procedure for the pound sterling, recommending lately the reduction of gold in the British sovereign until it should be intrinsically worth $3.63, the rate of New York exchange then prevailing for British currency. This proposal, however, met with an unlucky fate; for the sterling rate itself advanced to $4.24 almost as soon as the plan for "stabilizing" it at $3.63 had been put in print, and the London Statist, which had rashly stood sponsor for the proposal, was moved to confess a few weeks later that "revaluation of the pound sterling may now be altogether unnecessary, because the present trend of events points to the probability of its becoming equal in value to the gold sovereign before very long."

"Trend of events" is rather apt to have an awkward way with such happy-thought expedients. One is reminded of the English statesman who, after supporting exactly the same proposal during the depreciation of England's currency in the war with Napoleon, confessed to Parliament after abandoning the plan that the country's "moral feeling was the other way"; also of the other statesman of that day who admitted that "we could not agree as to what should be the amount of the new standard; I was of the opinion that it ought to be £4 10s. or £4 15s. per ounce gold, while my honorable friend thought it ought to be £5 5s. or £5 10s."

These confessions indicate some of the obstacles to the "devaluation plan" thus jauntily thrown out. England and France will in due course solve their problem, but solution of Central Europe's currency problem has not yet even been considered. In all probability the economic conference will be urged to consider it. Among the proposals which are likely to appear is that of the "Bank of Nations," the "Federal Reserve Bank of the World," of which we have heard already from Senator Hitchcock and Mr. Vanderlip. An international bank with the power of extending credit on foreign trade account is quite conceivable; the Ter Meulen plan has already outlined the possible machinery; but these other projects do not stop with that. Their banks is to issue a wholly new form of paper currency, to be advanced to Central European merchants against their negotiable assets.

The idea has appealed to many imaginations, but unfortunately has not been based on a serious effort to grapple with the details of its operation. No proponent of such plans has told us how a reserve could be accumulated sufficient to keep such currencies from depreciation, except for the wholly fantastic suggestion that the gold holdings of our Federal Reserve should somehow be commandeered. None of them has worked out intelligently the effect of such an imagined currency on the depreciated paper already afloat in Central Europe. On the face of things, the plan contemplates increase, not decrease, in paper currency outstanding, with the strong probability of two sets of depreciation in gold value, that of the national currencies and that of the international.

The economic conference will achieve at least one useful result if it points out plainly what can not be done. For the rest, it must depend on arrangements for mutual extension of credit, backed primarily by merchants and not by governments, whereby exchange of merchandise can be resumed with some escape from the paralyzing influence of worthless paper currencies and of the resulting extravagant home prices. The strong and solvent governments can cooperate toward such an end, but they can not as governments achieve it. The economic conference, however, may at least make it clear to Central Europe what must be done with the revenues, the expenditures, and the home inflation policies before the outside world can help.

A BATTLE FOR GOVERNMENT REFORM.

(Portland Oregonian.)

Much has been done by Budget Director Dawes to cut out waste in administration of the government and to bring the various bureaus into coordination, but the real work of bringing expenditure down to the lowest point consistent with the government's doing its work remains to be done. It consists in complete reconstruction of the governmental machine which has been built up piecemeal and in elimination of the many duplications, overlappings, and incongruities which add to expense at the same time that they take from efficiency. A plan of reorganization will soon be reported by the joint congressional committee and will then be before Congress for action.

The real struggle for reorganization will then begin. The plan will certainly involve transfer of many bureaus from one department to another. As heads of departments love power each will want to hold all that he has and to gain all that he can from the others. A highly diverting political scrimmage, costly to the people, would result unless some powerful influence could prevent. Reorganization would abolish many offices and would transfer others from one bureau or department to another against the wish of the holders. Each congressman would surely receive appeals from a number of officeholders to vote against features of the scheme that affected him. Those appeals would come from citizens of the congressman's state or district who had given him political support. By allowing them to be sacrificed to a sweeping reform he would lose their support and that of their friends and relations. The great majority of his constituents would probably favor the reorganization scheme, but they would sit quietly at home, relying on him to do his duty, while the small minority whose jobs were at stake would be vociferous and clamorous at Washington. He would be inclined to vote to pull out of the scheme the teeth which might bite his pets and to trade his vote for those of other members by voting to save their pets. In the end the amount of reorganization that would be effected would not be visible to the naked eye.

One force can prevent such a disaster; that is, an aroused public opinion, speaking with such force and volume that Congress will recognize it as having many more votes than have the men whose jobs are at stake. The people must realize that nothing is so repugnant to a congressman as abolition of an office in his district and that, when he is threatened, other congressmen have a fellow-feeling for him. The means by which useless offices have been abolished and great reforms accomplished has been the constant pressure of public opinion, actively exercised and growing until it becomes resistless. That pressure must be organized on behalf of government reorganization if it is to be accomplished.

Circumstances are now more favorable than formerly to those who would stir the people to declare themselves on reconstruction of the government machine. When all taxes were hidden in the price of liquor, tobacco, and imported goods, merely passing interest was taken in such measures. We now get frequent reminders that government costs money and that we pay taxes, for we pay income tax and must use revenue stamps and pay various direct imports. Without question reorganization of the machine would materially reduce expenses and would restrict the amount of our taxes. A congressman who voted against reform in order to keep a few men in useless jobs would be asked to explain by the many whose pockets were affected, provided they were awakened to their personal interest in the subject. The battle must be fought this year if anything is to be done, and it will be a battle between practically the whole of Washington City and the rest of the country.

THE CANADIAN GENERAL ELECTION.

(World's Work.)

On December 6th the people of Canada elected their fourteenth Parliament, and their unequivocal decision in favor of a change of government has fulfilled a general expectation. In the late House the Meighen government had a following of 125, as against 84 Liberals and 16 Progressives and Independents, but the completed results of the election show the standing of the various parties to be—Liberals 116, Progressives 64, Conservatives 51, Independent and Laborites 4. Such a devastating defeat which has eliminated the premier and nine cabinet ministers and leaves the government without a single supporter in the House of Commons from five out of the nine provinces leaves the Conservative party at the lowest ebb of its fortunes since Confederation and threatens it with the mournful fate of complete extinction which has befallen its Australian namesake under almost parallel circumstances.

For the first time in the history of Canadian Federal elections, a new third party, the Progressives, was able to offer a serious challenge to the two historic organizations, but while they swept the prairie provinces, they failed to realize their ambitions in other areas. In these the electorate were resolutely determined to punish the Meighen government, but were not prepared to sanction the radical programme of the Progressives and the drastic tariff reductions involved therein. Accordingly they allowed their resentment to find expression in votes for the Liberal party led by W. L. Mackenzie King, who had advocated with considerable skill a moderate programme and had given assurances that the existing protectionist system would not be materially altered. Apparently the French-Canadians have paid tribute to the memory of their beloved Laurier by a solid vote for the party which he so long and ably led, and their political solidarity, helped by extremely good luck in three-cornered contests in Ontario, has allowed the Liberals to outdistance their rivals and placed upon Mr. King the duty of forming a new administration.

But fortune's denial of a clear parliamentary majority and a serious dearth of supporters of cabinet calibre in three provinces have complicated Mr. King's task, and are forcing him to contemplate a coalition with the Progressives, whose co-operation could remedy his dangerous weakness in the Western provinces.

It seems doubtful, however, if he can wring the assent of the strong protectionist wing of his party to the concessions on tariff and railway policies which the Progressives demand as the price of their alliance. So he seems likely to be thrown back upon his followers for a cabinet, and as the French-Canadian element, who are at heart strongly conservative, will dominate it, no serious bouleversement in the national life of Canada need be anticipated in the immediate future. The Liberal party will preserve the present standards of protection and be jealous guardians of Canadian autonomy, but they will embark upon no radical policies. The advanced members of the party, however, will be continually straining at the leash and seeking an alliance with the Progressives. As a large number of Progressives regard their party as an expression of a movement of radical opinion rather than a political enterprise in search of office, they will probably decide to maintain an attitude of detached independence and hold a watching brief for the country. Obviously the Canadian political situation is still in a state of fluidity and the late election was only the first stage in a process of crystallization, which must be achieved before stable governments are assured.

Excavations carried on in the old cemetery of Courcbeufs (Sarthe) have led to the discovery of two statues of the sixteenth century. One represents a seigneur armed cap-a-pie. It is executed in stone and has suffered some mutilation. The other statue is in terra cotta and life-size. It represents a woman kneeling at prayer, her hands joined, evidently a castellan's lady. The head is missing. In the sixteenth century the castellan of Courcbeufs belonged to Diane de Meridor, Countess of Montsoreau.

With deficits everywhere and the budget full of holes, all kinds of taxation measures are proposed in Europe. One which is considered in Germany would consist in simply taxing stout people. Whoever among the men of seventeen to seventy-six years of age has a torso exceeding the fair average will be subject to a tax of from 300 to 1000 marks.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Mr. Shunko Lugiura, Japanese artist, is now in Washington for an exhibition of his paintings at the National Museum. Mr. Lugiura, who is seventy-nine years old, is said to be the greatest living exponent of Japanese art.

Mrs. Herbert Asquith, more familiarly known as Margot Asquith, is to arrive in America this week. Mrs. Asquith's visit is primarily a lecture tour to various parts of the country. The subject of her talks will be "People I Have Met" and the lectures are under the auspices of Lee Kedick. This will be America's introduction to the hostess of 10 Downing Street of the early days of the war.

Viscount Grey, whom Lord Robert Cecil has suggested as the next premier, has returned to English politics, after five years' retirement caused by poor eyesight. Lord Grey has long been in favor of the admission of Ireland on an equal basis with the dominions with the sole condition of an agreement that the naval defense should be under one authority. Lord Grey was Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs from 1905 to 1916, when his eyesight failed him and he withdrew from public life. His return was marked by a speech in which he reviewed the coalition cohesion of policy at home and abroad.

Huw Menai Williams is Wales' poet-miner, who bids fair to bring Welsh literature to the attention of the Anglo-Saxon world. Born in Carnarvonshire, Williams has been a coal miner at Glamorgan since he was sixteen. His work has therefore been entirely inspired among the sordid surroundings of a mining town. Intellectually, he is a self-made man. The remarkable thing about Williams' verse is that it is written in English—an acquired language for him and one that he has an extraordinary command of. His book, "Through the Upcast Shaft," is causing a furor in England.

Mr. George Wharton Pepper, who has been appointed United States senator to succeed the late Senator Boies Penrose, is one of Philadelphia's most distinguished lawyers. He is a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, the University of the South, and Yale University, taking his L.L. D. from the latter in 1914. He has been Biddle Professor of Law at the University of Pennsylvania and Lyman Beecher lecturer at Yale. He is a trustee of the University of Pennsylvania and of the Carnegie Institute. He is a fellow of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences. Mr. Pepper is the author of a number of legal studies, including "The Borderland of Federal and State Decisions" and a "Digest of the Laws of Pennsylvania." He is a member of the law firm of Henry, Pepper, Bodine & Pepper.

Alanson Bigelow Houghton of Corning, New York, whose appointment as Ambassador to Berlin has been announced, is the first regular diplomatic appointee from the United States to any of the countries with whom the Allies were at war. Mr. Houghton was born fifty-nine years ago at Cambridge, Massachusetts. After graduating from Harvard he studied at Gottingen, Berlin, and Paris. On returning to this country he engaged in the glass manufacturing business, and is at present head of a large glass works at Corning. He has been director of several corporations and is a trustee of Hobart College and St. Stephen's College. The new ambassador speaks German and French fluently. His appointment will create a vacancy in the New York delegation in the House, where Mr. Houghton is serving his second term as representative from the Thirty-Seventh District of New York.

Alexander Phimister Proctor, some of whose work is now being shown at the Bohemian Club art exhibition, is one of America's foremost sculptors. Mr. Proctor was born in Ontario, Canada, 1862, of Scotch-English parentage. He studied sculpture in Paris as the pupil of Puech and Ingalbert. He was awarded the designer's medal at the Chicago Exposition in 1893 for his sculptural groups and the gold medal at the Paris Exposition in 1900. He furnished the quadriga for the United States pavilion at the Paris Exposition and groups for the Buffalo Exposition in 1901. He was awarded a gold medal at the St. Louis Exposition in 1904 and again at the Panama-Pacific Exposition in 1915. His work is in public parks in New York, Denver, Pittsburgh, and Buffalo. He is a member of the National Institute of Arts and Letters, of the National Sculpture Society, the Canadian Art Club, the American Water Color Society, and of the Architectural League. Mr. Proctor is particularly celebrated as a sculptor of animals.

When Mr. Arthur J. Balfour came to this country in 1917, after President Wilson had declared against Germany, he was made a member of the India House of New York and received much entertainment from that body when his duties called him to the metropolis. The India House recently celebrated its seventh birthday anniversary and the head of the British delegation to the Arms Conference was the guest of honor. The others of the company showed a liberal sprinkling from the Washington Conference and included Lord Riddell, Sir Arthur Willart, Captain Gloster Armstrong, and Sir Henry Llewellyn-Smith of the British delegation, and Mr. Maurice Casenave of the French, together with many members who are well known in Washington—Captain T. C. Vogelsang, U. S. N., Charles Schwab, E. R. Stettinius, Lloyd C. Griscom, J. G. White, and Darwin P. Kingsley. The India House is much like the old East Indian Club, founded by an early citizen of Washington, Thomas Law, and is mainly to bring those engaging in Indian trade, whether east or west, into social intercourse.

Admiral Eberle, commander of the Pacific fleet, is a Texan. He was born in Denton, Texas, in 1864. He was graduated from the United States Naval Academy in 1885 and in '89 married Miss Tazie Harrison of San Francisco. During the Spanish-American war he served on the Oregon in 1898; and was in the Philippine insurrection in 1899. In the same year he was with the Asiatic fleet. He was with the Atlantic fleet in 1903-'05, and was on the Board of Inspection and Survey of the Navy Department from 1905 to 1907. He was executive officer of the Louisiana, 1907-1908, and commander of the Naval Training Station at San Francisco, 1908-10. In 1910 he was made commander of the Milwaukee and in 1911 of the Wheeling. He was commander of the Atlantic torpedo fleet, 1911-1913, and in 1914 of the U. S. S. Washington and of the naval force in Santo Domingo. In 1914-15 he was commanding the navy yard and naval factory at Washington. Throughout the war he was superintendent of the United States Naval Academy. He is a member of the Society of Foreign Wars.

Love Among the Ruins.

Where the quiet-colored end of evening smiles
Miles and miles
On the solitary pastures where our sheep
Half-asleep
Tinkle homeward through the twilight, stray or stop
As they crop—
Was the site once, of a city great and gay,
(So they say)
Of our country's very capital, its prince Ages since
Held his court in, gathered councils, wielding far Peace or war.

Now,—the country does not even boast a tree,
As you see,
To distinguish slopes of verdure, certain hills
From the hills
Intersect and give a name to (else they run Into one),
Where the domed and daring palace shot its spires
Up like fires
O'er the hundred-gaited circuit of a wall
Bouncing all,
Made of marble, men might march on nor be pressed,
Twelve abreast.

And such plenty and perfection, see, of grass Never was!
Such a carpet as, this summer-time, o'erspreads
And embeds
Every vestige of the city, guessed alone,
Stock or stone—
Where a multitude of men breathed joy and woe
Long ago;
Lust of glory picked their hearts up, dread of shame
Struck them tame;
And that glory and that shame alike, the gold
Bought and sold.

Now,—the single little turret that remains
On the plains,
By the caper overrooted, by the gourd
Overscored,
While the patching houseleek's head of blossom winks
Through the chinks—
Marks the basement whence a tower in ancient time
Sprang sublime,
And a burning ring, all round, the chariots traced
As they raced,
And the monarch and his minions and his dames
Viewed the games.

And I know, while thus the quiet-colored eve
Smiles to leave
To their folding, all our many-tinkling fleece
In such peace,
And the slopes and rills in undistinguished gray
Melt away—
That a girl with eager eyes and yellow hair
Waits me there
In the turret whence the charioteers caught soul
For the goal,
When the king looked, where she looks now, breathless, dumb
Till I come.

But he looked upon the city, every side,
Far and wide,
All the mountains topped with temples, all the glades'
Colonnades,
All the causeys, bridges, aqueducts,—and then,
All the men!
When I do come, she will speak not, she will stand,
Either hand
On my shoulder, give her eyes the first embrace
Of my face,
Ere we rush, ere we extinguished sight and speech
Each on each.

In one year they sent a million fighters forth
South and North,
And they built their gods a brazen pillar high
As the sky
Yet reserved a thousand chariots in full force—
Gold, of course.
Oh heart! oh blood that freezes, blood that burns!
Earth's returns
For whole centuries of folly, noise and sin!
Shut them in,
With their triumphs and their glories and the rest!
Love is best!

FIFTY YEARS OF JOURNALISM.

Melville Stone Writes His Eventful Life Story.

An experienced journalist who decides to write a book of memoirs enjoys two great and rather uncommon advantages. In the first place, he has memoirs to write, and secondly, he knows how to write them. How many authors of reminiscences are lacking in both these essentials! But the journalist, by the nature of things, lives in daily contact with significant personalities and events, and has constant practice in communicating facts about them to a diversified public. When, therefore, one sees such a name as Melville Stone's on the title page of a book of recollections, one can be sure of finding in it a rich fund of information, presented in an interesting and generally attractive way.

Mr. Stone is widely known as the former editor of the Chicago Daily News and general manager of the Associated Press. He has had practical experience in every branch of his profession, and is responsible for many of the best features in the modern newspaper. He belongs more appropriately, perhaps, to the days when newspaper writing was a less highly specialized affair than it is now, and when the men who followed this calling were of a broader and more versatile stamp. At that time the young journalist drifted into newspaper work, often after having followed a variety of other occupations, and after having gained a wide acquaintance with a diversely occupied world. It is useless to pretend that the writing of those days was not on the whole of a higher order, and endowed with more personality and more of the zest of adventure than at present. (As this reviewer was not fortunate enough to be alive at that time, the opinion can not be ascribed to a parti pris.)

The breadth of humanity and the spirit of adventurous comradeship so apparent in the old journalism is one of the most attractive traits in Mr. Stone's book. Characteristically, he became a writer after many ventures in other directions which brought him acquainted with all sorts and conditions of men. He approaches his life story by the same happy plan of seeming haphazard, and diversifies the personal details with many excursions into the careers of others, so that the book might quite as properly have been called "My Friends in Fifty Years of Journalism." This genial tendency prompts him in the earlier chapters to introduce us to an embarrassing number of his relatives, several of whom had followed his own profession:

Among the journalists was Emily Crawford, the famous Paris correspondent. She and her husband, George Morland Crawford, were people of note in their day. Crawford and the novelist Thackeray had been friends from early manhood. They were both of Trinity College, Cambridge, roommates at 2, Lamb Court, Inner Temple, studying law; members of the same London clubs, and both turned to journalism rather than the profession of law. As the years went on Thackeray became a partial owner of the London Daily News and, upon his suggestion, Crawford was appointed in 1851 resident correspondent for the paper, in Paris. What Thackeray thought of his friend may best be learned from a letter which he wrote to Crawford, who had nursed him through a critical illness in 1849—one which well-nigh left the story of "Pendennis" forever unfinished. The letter was of the book in which Thackeray visualized Crawford as George Warrington, the friend of Arthur Pendennis. In it he said:

"You will find much to remind you of the old talks in this book. There is something of you in Warrington, but he is not fit to hold a candle to you, for taking you all-round, you are the most genuine fellow that ever strayed from a better world into this. You don't smoke, and he is a confirmed smoker of tobacco. Bordeaux and Port were your favorites at 'The Deanery' and 'The Garrick' and Warrington is guzzling beer. But he has your honesty, and, like you, couldn't posture if he tried. You had a strong affinity for the Irish. May you some day find an Irish girl to lead you to matrimony. There's no such good wife as a daughter of Erin."

The Irish wife whom Crawford was to find was Emily, the granddaughter of Amelia Fox Johnstone of Cleveland, Ohio, who was my mother's aunt. When a girl of seventeen, Emily went to Paris to study at the Sorbonne. While yet in her teens she sent some articles to the London Morning Star, which so pleased the editor that he appointed her Paris correspondent. Thus she and Crawford met, and in 1864 they were married. Thackeray was not privileged to attend the wedding. He died in 1863.

For twenty-two years, until the death of Crawford in 1885, the couple worked together in a literary partnership seldom likened. They were both journalists of the best type, having wide knowledge of affairs, keen sense of perspective, fine literary style, ceaseless industry, and a vivid appreciation of the responsibilities attaching to the office.

Melville Stone's parents were of English, Scotch, and Irish stock. His father was a circuit-riding preacher. This meant much traveling for young Melville, from his birthplace in Hudson, Illinois, to Chicago, to Libertyville, to De Kalb and other sections of the state, and the changing scenes had their due effect on art active and observant mind. His father increased the family exchequer by selling Bibles and religious books, and later by manufacturing a decoction called "Stone's Chinese Liniment for Man and Beast." These varia industria had their counterpart in the varied occupations followed by the son in his early years. About the time of Lincoln's election the family moved to Chicago, where Melville contributed his share to the support of the family by delivering newspapers and sweeping out the Board of Trade rooms before and after school hours. For the youth of that time this appears to have been an infallible recipe for success:

I entered the Chicago High School, but after a year was forced to drop out for a twelve-month. I never finished the course. At the close of his two years' service, my father was sent to the church at Kankakee, and thither I followed him. I bought and sold old paper and rags for a time, and then secured a position in the leading dry goods store of the place. Outside of the town there were two or three settlements of French Canadians. I soon picked up their patois and was able to serve them as a clerk in our store. One day there was a public examination for teachers' certificates, conducted under the auspices of the state superintendent of public instruction. I attended, answered the questions, and was adjudged fit to teach. I was then fifteen years old. I was offered a school in a remote corner of the country, but on condition that I should "board around," that is, that I should live with one family or another a week at a time. On reflection I declined. Then I learned of a patent gong doorbell, for which there seemed to be a market. Doorbells were a novelty in Illinois in those days. I bought a stock of the bells and the necessary tools to affix them and set out. I peddled them from house to house with success for several months.

Not long afterwards, his father abandoned the ministry to join a brother in Chicago in the manufacture of sawmill tools. Here young Stone began to study law and wished to continue, but being dissuaded by his mother, he took up bookkeeping instead, and attempted to learn the machinist's trade in his spare time. These were eventful days:

When I was in the Chicago High School the war was on and there were recruiting, marching, and tearful good-bys everywhere. The city developed two of the best writers of war songs the world has ever known.

Dr. George F. Root of the music-publishing firm of Root & Cady wrote: "The Battle Cry of Freedom"; "Tramp, Tramp, Tramp, the Boys Are Marching"; and "Just Before the Battle, Mother."

Henry C. Work, a journeyman printer, wrote: "Kingdom Coming"; "Babylon Is Fallen"; and "Marching Through Georgia." He also wrote "My Grandfather's Clock." Later we organized brigades of various sorts—there was the Irish Brigade under General Mulligan, who fought in almost the first battle of the war, and there were the Germans, who went "to fight mit Sigel." Illinois contributed more than her share of men to the Union cause.

In the midsummer of 1864 Mr. Ballentine, commercial editor of the Chicago Tribune and father of a schoolmate of mine, asked me to help him in his work. This resulted in a short period of service as a reporter, although I was but sixteen years of age.

There were the makings of big men in Chicago at that time, but we did not know how big they were to become. For example, I used often to take our family washing to a neighboring laundry. This establishment was maintained by one George M. Pullman, who had just invented a sleeping-car. He had set up a laundry to wash the bed linen of the cars, and took in consumers' work to help eke out expenses. He became one of the great millionaires of the nation.

I shall never forget a morning in April, 1865. We lived on West Madison Street in Chicago, and it was my habit to rise early and get the morning paper. I did so on this particular morning and came bounding through the house, announcing the assassination of Mr. Lincoln. I dressed at once and started for the Tribune office. When I reached there the street was crowded, and the windows were filled with bulletins announcing the death of Mr. Lincoln, Secretary Seward, General Grant, and Andrew Johnson. The wild burst of rage was beyond description. Unable to enter the Tribune Building because of the crowd, I made my way around the corner to the Matteson House, which was located at the corner of Dearborn and Randolph Street, a block away. In it was an ancient lounging rotunda. It was packed. Very soon I heard the crack of a revolver, and a man fell in the centre of the room. His assailant stood perfectly composed with a smoking revolver in his hand, and justified his action by saying: "He said it served Lincoln right." There was no arrest. No one would have dared arrest the man. He walked out a hero. I never knew who he was.

The year 1868 found him a reporter on the Chicago Republican. Attending the Republican National Convention at Crosby's Opera House on May 20th, he obtained his first "close-up" of big politics. The poet of the occasion seems to have compensated in vivacity for his metrical deficiencies:

With great enthusiasm, General Grant was nominated for President and Schuyler Colfax for Vice-President. The rally song of the day was written by General Halpine (Miles O'Reilly), and ran thus:

So, boys, a final bumper,
While we all in chorus chant,
For next President we nominate
Our own Ulysses Grant.

And if asked what state he hails from,
This our sole reply shall be:
"From near Appomattox Court House,
And its famous apple tree."

For 'twas there to our Ulysses
That Lee gave up the fight,
Now, boys, to Grant for President,
And God defend the right.

At the age of twenty, also, Stone began the publication of his first newspaper, as an adjunct to a saw and flour mill. It was called The Sawyer and Mechanic:

My paper did not last long. Then my father bought for me an interest in an iron foundry and machine shop. I was successful and soon after purchased the interests of my partners and became sole owner. On November 25, 1869, I was married. Shortly after, the folding iron theatre chair made its first appearance and took the place of the old-fashioned benches that had been in common use. I secured the right to use a patent and introduced a folding theatre chair of my own to Chicago. I furnished Wood's Museum with a thousand of these folding chairs in the spring of 1871, and in the later summer sold another thousand to Crosby's Opera House.

On the evening of the 8th of October, 1871, I had finished my contract in Crosby's Opera House, save some details that would occupy perhaps two hours. Mr. Crosby asked me to complete the work on the following morning, Sunday, because Thomas' Orchestra was to open the house on Monday night and would need the place for rehearsal on Monday forenoon. I objected and told him that I could easily finish the task on Monday morning in ample time for the rehearsal. It was then agreed that we should meet the succeeding evening and light the place for a sort of unofficial opening. As we stood upon the stage viewing the beautiful scene (Mr. Crosby had expended a vast sum of money in refurbishing the place) some one said that the stage carpenter had lost his all the night before in a fire in a remote section of the city. I casually remarked that it would be a horrible thing if the opera house should burn, to which Crosby replied, laughingly: "Oh, it will not. I have studied the statistics of theatre fires and they occur on an average of once in five years. We had a fire two years ago, so we are immune for three more."

Late that night I went home. I lived three miles away. I had scarcely gone to bed when there was a wild alarm and the great Chicago fire had begun. I dressed and started for my foundry. As I neared it, I found myself shut off by the flames and saw that it would be impossible for me to reach the place. Later it turned out that two of my iron moulders, in an effort to save the wooden patterns, had gone there and been burned to death. I wandered away aimlessly and finally sat down on the steps of the First National Bank Building on the corner of Washington and State Streets. As indicative of the curious state of mind that one takes on in such disasters, I remember that a man sat at my side with a mass of sheets of postage stamps that he had evidently taken from some office to save. With scissors in hand he was calmly cutting them in shreds and throwing them in the street. It occasioned no surprise in my mind, but seemed to be a perfectly natural thing to do.

The great fire put a providential term to his career as a saw and flour miller, etc., and the offer of the managership of a newspaper, the Republican, definitely committed him to the profession he was to pursue with so much success through the remainder of his life. It was typical of his destiny that he should strike the current of larger affairs almost at the outset:

I made the acquaintance of a remarkable character, one Baron de Palm. At first sight one would recognize him as a decayed voluptuary, of the sort that frequent the Continental watering places of Europe in the season. Habited faultlessly, with hair and beard carefully dressed, washed-out face and eyes, shaly on his legs, he had evidently, like Cousin John's profligate in Owen Meredith's "Lucille," never neglected an occasion to please himself. Such men were almost unknown at the time in bustling Chicago.

He told me his life's story. He was a Bavarian. He was Baron Johan Heinrich Ludwig de Palm; had descended from a line of German barons running back ten centuries. He was Grand Cross Commander of the Order of the Holy Sepulchre. His father was a prince of the Holy Roman Empire, and his mother a notable Countess of Thunefeldt. Born at Augsburg in 1809, he was educated for a diplomatic career, and served his king with distinction at almost every capital. Then he came to be chamberlain of Ludwig I, and here was experience. Ludwig was not the crazy Bavarian king, but in his veins ran the insane current which marked his family. Some one said of him that he was a "Lovelace with a touch of the Minnesinger about him—a mixture of Haroud-al-Raschid and Henry IV, the most meritorious and meretricious monarch of Europe." He built the Glyptothek, the Pinakothek, the Walhalla, and practically all of the show places of Munich. He came to the throne determined to give his people a liberal form of government, and for a time he honestly struggled to that end.

Withal he had pronounced weaknesses. It was De Palm's mission to minister to these.

One day an Irish girl arrived in Munich to fill an engagement as a Spanish dancer at the theatre. She was not a good dansuse, but she was young and good-looking. De Palm made her acquaintance at once. He knew her as Lizzie Gilbert, then and ever after. Her stage name was Lola Montez, and under this pseudonym she earned world-wide fame. Her real name was probably Maria Dolores Eliza Rosanna Gilbert, although it was not quite certain. She was born at Limerick, Ireland, about 1818. Her father was a respectable country squire and her mother a Spanish chorus girl. The squire was sent to India for service and died there, leaving a young widow and her infant daughter. The daughter learned bad tricks from the Hindu servants, and it became necessary for her mother to take her back to England. Life in the homeland did not reform her, for when she was little more than fifteen she eloped with a certain Captain James of the British army, and they were married. Again there was an assignment to India. Soon Eliza's conduct compelled her husband to divorce her.

She returned to Europe and went on the stage as a Spanish dancer. She made her debut as "Lola Montez" at Her Majesty's Theatre, London, was hissed and dismissed at once. Then she set out for the Continent, and appeared at one city after another, with varying success, but with ever-attendant scandalous incident, until, six years later, she arrived in Munich.

When De Palm saw her, he thought she might please his royal master. And he was not wrong. He introduced her to the king, and five days later the monarch called together his ministers and presented his "Lolita" to them as his "best friend." She was shrewd, and, indeed, intellectually brilliant. Very soon she had achieved complete mastery of the king. He created her Comtesse de Landsfeld, built her a villa, and gave her an ample income. She practically usurped the place of the queen and also, and not unwisely, dictated the liberalizing policy of the Bavarian government. Then came the wave of revolution which swept over Europe in 1848, and it burst upon Bavaria.

The court scandal was made the occasion for the revolt. The king was forced to decree that the Comtesse de Landsfeld had "ceased to possess the rights of naturalization in Bavaria," and to order her imprisonment as a disturber of the peace of the kingdom. She escaped, but secretly returned in boy's clothing and advised the king to abdicate, which he did. She floated around for a time, always getting into trouble. She married again and again, was charged with bigamy, escaped to Spain, and thence, in 1851, to New York.

With the downfall of the king, De Palm also left Munich, and for a time he was with Lola Montez. Then they quarreled and he went to one of his castles on Lake Constance. She came to America. She appeared a number of times on the Boston and New York stage. A clergyman wrote some lectures for her and she delivered them, with success, throughout the United States. She also published them in book form. Finally, when but forty-two years old, she broke down, came to New York, fell under the influence of a worthy clergyman, did missionary work among the Magdalens of the city for a few months, and then died in comparative poverty in Astoria, Long Island, and was buried in Greenwich Cemetery in Brooklyn.

From this point on, Mr. Stone's story is a succession of extraordinary encounters. Some of them will be detailed in the next issue of the Argonaut.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ended January 28, 1922, were $119,500,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $117,300,000; a gain of $2,200,000.

Ideal conditions exist for the maintenance of a rising bond market. Gold reserves of the Federal Reserve banks, which are the basis of credit at the banking end, have reached new high levels—close to $3,000,- of loanable funds in excess of the demand have been a reduction in time money rates to 4½ per cent., the lowest rate since August, 1917, and comparing with 7½ per cent. a year ago; commercial paper at 4¾ to 5 per cent., against 8 per cent. a year ago; and call money at 3½ per cent., as compared with 7 per cent. in the first week of 1921.

What the ultimate result will be can only be guessed, and in guessing one should remember what happened not so many years ago: following one of the money panics that used to shake the country periodically, a Wall Street brokerage house was able to borrow $200,000 for six months at one-half of 1 per cent., and that was only two years after the same firm had been forced to pay a heavy premium on an over-night loan of $100,000 and had been glad to get the money at any price.

Money may not be loaned at one-half of 1 per cent. in 1922, or even at 2 per cent., but all signs point to its being very cheap—cheaper than in many years. No better outlook could be wished by those who are putting their money into high-grade bonds.

In addition there is the prospect, or rather the certainty—over the longer outlook—that taxes will be gradually reduced; so that a gradual shifting of enormous investment funds from tax-exempt securities to taxable securities will surely occur. And the uncertain business outlook should not bother the bond investor one whit, because smaller industrial profits will make well-seasoned mortgage securities the more attractive.

In these times, when the number of people thinking of making investments is many times greater than it was before the war, what we need are more enlightening definitions of "investment" and "speculation" than the dictionaries give.

Montgomery Rollins in his reference book, "Money and Investments," defines "investment" as "the purchase of real property, stocks, or some evidence of indebtedness, with the purpose of obtaining an interest return upon the money; any increase in the value of the principal being but a secondary consideration, but the safety of the principal a first consideration." "Speculation," he says, "is discounting future events. This differs from investment because it has as the direct object buying in expectation of a rise in value, or of selling expecting to buy again at a lower price in time to make delivery, having no regard for the income-producing capacity; whereas investment considers the interest return and safety of principal as the first object." He quotes another writer who expresses it: "Planting good seed in fertile soil is investment, betting on how many potatoes the seed will produce to a hill is speculation."

Sereno S. Pratt in "The Work of Wall Street" refers to this need for a better understanding of terms. "It is unfortunate," he says, "that the words 'investment,' 'speculation,' and 'gambling' should be used so loosely, without a clear conception of the difference between them. . . . If we restore their true meanings, we shall promote sound thinking on some important subjects."

Many people who think they are investing their money today are not even speculating, they are gambling. If the man who bet on the potato crop knew nothing about the character of the seed or the fertility of the soil, he would have been gambling and not speculating. Those who buy the offerings of the blue sky promoters or securities from houses of little or bad reputation know as little about the seed or the soil and are gambling with their money.

It is not as easy to distinguish between investing and speculating as between investing and gambling. Speculation has a legitimate place in nearly every business, in the buying and selling of securities as well as in other business operations such as the buying of jackknives. Unfortunately, in the buying of securities many people confuse it with gambling and it has a bad name. But it may enter as a factor in the purchase of the safest securities which constitute the best of investments. Last month, for instance, it was shown in this place how advantage can be taken of the ebb and flow of the tides in the bond market to increase one's investment principal. Investors may well have an eye to profits as well as to interest; but their first consideration should be to the safety of their principal and the regularity of their interest return.

But how is the would-be investor to know that the securities he is contemplating buying are not speculative or worse? There is no fixed line of demarcation, on one side of which are investment issues and on the other side speculative? In fact what might be an investment for one person would be too speculative for another. But there are certain guideposts which one can go by that will help to keep him on the comparatively safe road of investment. To protect the money of their people in the savings banks certain states, for instance, have passed laws specifying the character of securities these banks can buy, and some of these laws, such as the ones in New York and Massachusetts, afford good guides for investors. These give a list of well-seasoned bonds that it would be well for investors who can afford to take no risks to confine their purchases to. But there are new bonds coming on the market all the time, many of which are entitled to a high investment rating although they are not legal for savings bank investments, and the best way for the inexperienced investor to discriminate among these is to buy them only from investment houses of the highest reputation and only when such houses recommend them to fit the investor's particular requirements.

That the industrial crisis has passed the acute and alarming stage appears clear, and the best evidence of that is disclosed by the improvement in the money market. While call money shows no particular change, time loans in the closing days of 1921 ruled at 5 to 5¼ per cent. as against 7¼ to 7½ per cent. the year before, and commercial paper was 5 to 5¼ per cent. as contrasted with 7¼ to 8 per cent. in December, 1920. During the interval the reserve ratio of the Federal Reserve banks increased from 45.4 per cent. to 73.1 per cent. Their total earning assets, made up in large part of rediscounts and bills purchased, decreased from $3,130,000,000 to $1,535,900,000, and the volume of circulating notes declined $961,400,000. During the same interval the gold reserve expanded from $2,059,300,000 to $2,869,600,000. But the improvement in money and credit is clearly the result of liquidation due to the continued depression and the fall in commodity prices. The former has resulted in the largest number of failures in any one year in the history of the country—namely, 19,602, involving liabilities of $617,774,364. This compares with 8881 failures with liabilities of $295,121,805 in 1920, and with 6451 defaults with liabilities of $113,291,237 in 1919.

Under the existing circumstances about all that one can reasonably hope for for the coming year is a quiet and orderly business with slowly improving tendencies, as liquidation progresses and as further readjustments are accomplished. Unless something very remarkable should evolve out of the Limitation of Arms Conference at Washington, the Financial Conference which is scheduled to meet at Cannes in the near future, or some wholly unforeseen development affecting the constituents of economics and finance, there can be nothing approaching a business boom this year; there are too many obstacles, too many price inequalities, and too many incomplete adjustments in the way for that. But it is wholly possible and not unlikely that the country may experience better industrial conditions in the closing half of the year. This because the basic conditions are really improving slowly, and they are likely to improve still more if the crops turn out satisfactorily, enabling the farmers to liquidate their indebtedness still further and provide a surplus.

Burdensome taxes of course stand in the way of improvement, for they destroy business initiative, and among the features which may halt the recovery are such matters as an ill-considered tariff measure and a soldiers' bonus bill, the latter if it adds one additional dollar to liquid assets, but when assets are in too liquid a state they quite often are not earning money. Business recovery has been altogether too slow to make any impression upon the accumulation of loanable funds in the banks, and, since this has been the case all over the country, the result has been an influx of funds upon the markets in the chief money centres, such as New York, Chicago, St. Louis, Philadelphia, and Boston. And even the $100,000,000-a-week output of new securities has not been sufficient to offset this steady flow of money.

So strong is the Federal Reserve banking position that, after setting aside 35 per cent. against deposit liabilities, there is left, in gold, practically dollar for dollar back of note circulation (says Forbes Magazine).

to the enormous exactions under which the country is now laboring. It is not impossible, of course, that the speculative stock market may anticipate by some months any genuine improvement in business conditions, but the bond market is likely to prove a safer field for operations for some time yet to come. If the business revival is deferred, as now seems likely, until the closing half of the year, in any event, liquidation will continue, and the further relaxation in money will find a pro-absorb to a large extent accumulated stocks so that a gradual increase in output of many classes of manufactures may be expected. Future needs must be supplied primarily from current production (says the National Bank of Commerce in New York). This means greater business activity and explains the expansion in manufactures which has taken place in recent weeks.

The general tone of business during the first two weeks of January has been encouraging. The total physical volume of retail trade is good. Sales in agricultural districts continue slower than in cities, with trade in the East and Northeast and in Southern California cities better than in the remainder of the country. Necessities are selling much better than are luxuries, and this was characteristic of the Christmas trade. Although it is generally recognized that buyers in all lines will wisely continue to be cautious as to future commitments, it seems probable that there will be a moderately well-sustained distribution of goods into wholesale as well as into retail channels.

Unemployment is unquestionably widespread, but probably its extent has been somewhat overestimated. Special measures undertaken to lessen it, particularly public works, are doing much to alleviate its worst features. The major part of the productive energy of the country is absorbed in clothing, feeding, and sheltering the population. Farmers certainly will not buy heavily, but they must have such foodstuffs as are not produced on farms, as well as necessary clothing. They must buy some farm implements, for even with the more careful repairing which is increasingly practiced, a certain proportion of farm machinery steadily becomes unusable. They will buy some fertilizer, and they will buy articles of convenience and even of luxury to some extent.

Railroads have made notable gains in economy of operation, and improved credit conditions have definitely bettered their outlook, although traffic is at present disappointing in volume. The heavy decline in tonnage, serious as it has been, has primarily been the result of lessened shipments of coal, iron ore, and similar heavy commodities. Reasonable buying of rails, cars, locomotives, and other equipment may be expected during the current year.

The year opens with promise of active building construction. With gradually declining yields on all classes of investments it may be expected that funds heretofore unavailable to the mortgage market will be turned into construction projects.

Labor has not been liquidated and building costs therefore are still far above pre-war levels, and are out of line with prices generally. This condition operates especially against building and construction for production of income, but not so heavily against individual enterprises for personal occupancy, or public buildings and public works.

Consequently the field of residence building and public construction offers the greatest promise. The housing shortage has not yet been met. The entire country needs highway construction, and there is widespread necessity for essential public buildings. It is recognized as good public policy to carry on construction of these classes at times when industrial activity is at a relatively low level. Lower money is making this construction possible. This is unmistakably shown by the volume of state, county, and municipal bond issues in the United States in 1921. The total for the entire country is unavailable, but offerings are known to have exceeded $1,000,000,000.

The new Federal tax law, while not all that has been hoped for, is more favorable to business than the preceding act. In a period such as the present, in which losses have been widespread, the new net loss provision will greatly benefit businesses which are struggling to reestablish themselves. Net business losses incurred in the calendar year 1921 or thereafter may be carried forward and deducted from the income of the succeeding year, and if need be, from that of the next succeeding year.

In the year ended June 30, 1921, actual tax receipts were $4,978,300,000. For the fiscal year 1922 receipts are estimated at $3,568,000,000, a decrease of approximately $1,400,000,000. This reduction in the aggregate of the Federal tax levy is largely made possible by greater economy in expenditure, and signalizes the first definite achievement toward lessening the tax burden on the people of the United States. If expenditures for 1922 are rigidly held within the limits of estimated receipts the return of better business conditions will have received a great impetus.

Officials of the well-known bond firm of William R. Staats Company received many congratulations from their friends and clients when the firm moved into its new offices on the second floor of the new Alexander Building, at Montgomery and Bush Streets.

The William R. Staats Company for many years was located on the ground floor of the Merchants' Exchange Building until a short time ago, when they were obliged to take temporary quarters at 401 Montgomery Street, pending the completion of the Alexander Building.

The new offices, which occupy almost the entire second floor of the Alexander Building, are so arranged that all officers of the firm are conveniently located for increased business efficiency. The offices are spacious and artistically decorated and have all conveniences for customers.

The company, which was established in 1887, is one of the oldest of its kind in the state and was the first to be incorporated under the laws of California.

Earnings of Cities Service Company for December, 1921, continued to show improvement over preceding months, gross for December being $1,193,449, an increase of $16,556 over November and $473,180 over gross for September, 1921. After providing for all expenses, interest, and other prior charges, net earnings applicable to reserves, dividends, and surplus for December were $955,597, while after setting aside requirements for payment of dividends on the preferred stock there was a balance for the month applicable to reserves, dividends on the common stock, and surplus of $585,967, an increase of $22,153 over November, 1921. No changes were made in prices for Mid-Continent crude oil in December, while in the public utility division there was a gratifying improvement in both gross and net revenues, net from operations being the largest for any one month in the history of the company. For the twelve months of 1921 comparative net earnings from operations of public utilities reflected an increase of 32 per cent. over 1920, with all indications pointing to a steady improvement in the utility business for 1922. For the twelve months ending December 31, 1921, gross earnings of Cities Service Company were $13,461,770, with a balance after providing for all expenses, interest, and other prior charges of $10,846,585, the balance available for reserves, dividends on the common stock, and surplus for the year being $5,989,954, equivalent to $13.04 on the average amount of common stock outstanding.

The Freeman, Smith & Camp Company are offering $19,000 Laguna Joint School District (Fresno and Kings counties) 6 per cent. bonds, due serially July 20, 1924 to 1942.

Laguna Joint School District is situated in the southwestern part of Fresno County and a small portion of Kings County, about five miles west of Kingsburg. The district is highly developed agriculturally, being devoted largely to dairying, alfalfa, vineyards, and orchards. These bonds have been sold to provide a new school made necessary by the growth of the district.

An offering is also being made of $8000 Glendora Joint School District (Fresno and Kings counties) 6 per cent. bonds, due serially August 20, 1924 to 1931.

Glendora Joint School District comprises about 10,528 acres, situated in the southwestern portion of Fresno County about two miles south of Lanare. The district is highly developed agriculturally, being largely devoted to alfalfa and general farming. These bonds are issued to provide a new school made necessary by the growth of the district.

Also $8000 Rosedale School District (Fresno County) 6 per cent. bonds, due serially July 23, 1922 to 1929.

Rosedale School District is situated in the south central part of Fresno County between Fresno and Sanger, which comprises about 3840 acres of highly developed agricultural land largely devoted to the raising of Thompson's seedless grapes. These bonds have been issued to provide a new school made necessary by the growth of the district.

All the above bonds are tax exempt in California and exempt from all Federal income tax.

The Pacific Gas and Electric Company is about to expend one million dollars in improvements of gas service to consumers in Oakland and vicinity.

The leading item on the schedule of expenditure is one of $600,000 for a new gas-holder of 6,000,000 cubic feet capacity to be erected at the company's gas-works at the foot of Castro Street, Oakland. This will be the largest gas-holder in Northern California, although one of similar size is owned and operated by the Los Angeles Gas and Electric Corporation in the southern metropolis. The contract for this has been placed with the Bartlett Hayward Manufacturing Company of Baltimore, Maryland.

In design it is to be a telescopic, five-lift steel gas-holder, with steel tank. It will be 219 feet in height, and what this means can best be appreciated by comparison with some well-known high building in San Francisco, just as, for instance, the Hotel St. Francis, which measures 187 feet from the sidewalk. The steel tank will be 219 feet in diameter by 36 feet in height and will contain 10,311,770 gallons of water. The total weight of steel to be used in the entire structure will be 5,500,000 pounds. The foundation of the gas-holder will be of concrete supported by piling, this latter made necessary by the marshy condition of the ground at the gas-works, and the construction of this foundation will take 2800 cubic yards of concrete and 4500 wood piles.

The balance of the money appropriated for improvements of gas service in the territory named will be expended in new compressors and additions and betterments of transmission equipment. The Oakland gas-works supplies not only the central cities of Oakland, Alameda, and Berkeley, but, through its high-pressure system, extends its service as far as Richmond, in Contra Costa County, on the north, and Hayward on the east. ## BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

There is a curious illusion on the part of many people that the more sordid a book or a play or more particularly a novel is, the more lifelike it is. The impression, of course, is due to the patent fact that the less sordid and the more ideal the representation, the more it retreats from a resemblance to nature. The converse, despite the enthusiasm with which it is exploited by our post-war school of youthful novelists, does not hold. Your realist, however, to whom reality spells squalor, argues that since the masses are poverty-stricken, his books must be equally impoverished. He knows no alternative but tinsel. We Americans are a forthright people. We are not given to shades and nuances. We are inclined to think that gradation smacks of sophistry, and sophistry besides being the hallmark of the devil is also the mark of a decadent civilization. It may be so. But one thing is certain. American fiction can go a long way uphill before it hits the down slant of decadence. At present it would stand a judicious mixture of tones, if one may mix his metaphors. On the one side we have the good-as-gold, heart-of-oak type of fiction that may be most easily illustrated by Harold Bell Wright; and on the other the no-better-than-she-ought-to-be sort of heroine of the "Moon-Calf" class of novel. I am somewhat handicapped in dealing with the new school, as "Moon-Calf" represents my sole adventure. But since other reviewers have conveniently used it to typify the class, I may do likewise.

Of course we have such a shining light as Edith Wharton, who in my opinion merits the Nobel Prize fully as much as any of the European winners. But Mrs. Wharton is the exception that proves the rule. The moment we admit her superiority we also admit the great chasm that exists between her and all other living American novelists. We have, after all, produced one contemporary genius. But what we need is not a host of imitators of Edith Wharton, but a school of sincere writers to perpetuate the particular phase of life they are familiar with. We have, to be sure, our interpreters of New England, of the South, and very largely of Greenwich Village and of the West. But it is their interpretation that is at fault—not their subject. What we have not got is anything like the little band of earnest novelists who depict the light and shade of the English middle classes. Our realists are not content with being merely earnest. With true Yankee bravado they insist on going one better and being sombre. Squalor or tinsel. Greenwich Village Follies or the Smart Set or the slums. Moderation is not for us. Truly, it is no wonder that we are misunderstood abroad. In that respect we have a close analogy with the French, whose fiction is said to misrepresent so grossly the national spirit. In short, a novelist should think twice before he writes merely to satisfy his own love of gloomy values. And he should be made to think in the pillory or to cool his impetuosity in the stocks before being allowed to publish pink and gold rubbish whose raison d'être is patently that of pot-boiling. If we must have blue laws, let's have a useful one.

At the risk of being called Anglophile one has to admit that the English have a genius for novel-writing. After all, they invented the form and perhaps it is natural that they excel in it. There is something peculiarly British about the idea of a novel—something in its mixture of romanticism and reality, a mixture that does represent the ingredients of the average Anglo-Saxon existence. It is full of hard facts and even of squalor. But it is the peculiar genius of the Anglo-Saxon that he invests even these things with a romantic glamour. In fact, our true-blue, large-canvas, thin-paint kind of novel, ranging from Winston Churchill to our Western creator of the cactus epic, is more Anglo-Saxon in spirit than is the sombre chronicler of small-town vice.

A novel that represents this peculiar British trait of combining the prose and poetry of life is "Joanna Godden," by Sheila Kaye-Smith (Dutton; $2). After all, life would be intolerable without idealism, and the realist who strips his theme to the bone gives us, not life, but a skeleton. And death, though it may be the realest fact of our existence, is nevertheless monotonous. Miss Kaye-Smith is a true realist. She deals with the infinite interests of life. "Joanna Godden" is conceded in England to be Miss Kaye-Smith's finest novel. And to any one who has read her previous books, that statement alone would suffice for advertisement of the new book. But for the matter of that Miss Kaye-Smith's name is sufficient advertisement to her readers. In England she is called the greatest living woman novelist. There is really no particular reason why the word "woman" should be included. But England is a man's country and tradition dies hard. "Joanna Godden" is a novel of atmosphere, of plot, and of character study. One does not cavil at the Boston Transcript for calling it, or rather its author's work, fiction at its very best. What more should fiction be? As a matter of critical fact the only quality that Miss Kaye-Smith's work lacks is what is usually known as a brilliant style. Her manner is as homely as her scenes, and in one sense it is the perfect manner for the books she writes. Her novels have the unique effect of being spontaneous growths. Almost less than any other writer does her personality obtrude. One can forget that there is a writer, so little of the machinery of the workshop is left about her finished product. It is sui generis. Whether Miss Kaye-Smith is subtle enough to realize the fitness of her manner, one can only guess. If she is, hers is the art that conceals art. But I think her books are really the epic growth of the English countryside, finding their inspired interpreter in Sheila Kaye-Smith. R. G.

It is now possible to draw "canned music" from a cornet. Private Jowett of the British army of occupation on the Rhine has invented a cornet which is fingered automatically by a perforated roll of paper. The operator need only do the blowing to produce the tunes. The invention will be applied to other wind instruments.

Notes of Books and Authors.

Colonel Repington, whose frank "Diaries" threw British society into paroxysms of joy and amazement only equaled by Margot Asquith's utterances, is about to sail for America. This time he will go on an extensive lecture tour of three months' duration. His subject will be, "Personalities in Europe" and "The Washington Conference and Its Consequences." Colonel Repington knows the "personalities" as do few living men, and not only did he attend the Conference, but he knows many of the participants intimately.

Archibald Marshall has returned to England and is now hard at work on his new novel, "The Rectory Family," which is to be a continuation of his Clinton Series and will be published by Dodd, Mead & Co.

The Houghton Mifflin Company recently published a new and enlarged edition of the "Manual of the Trees of North America," by Charles Sprague Sargent. This botanical classic has been in steady and undiminished demand ever since its first appearance. Mr. Sargent has gathered new facts and many new pictures of interest and importance. The author has made trees his lifelong study. Since its first founding in 1872 he has been the director of the famous Arnold Arboretum.

Ian Hay, author of "The Willing Horse" (Houghton Mifflin Company), has only published twelve books in all, and of those but half have been novels. Yet over 1,750,000 copies of his books have been sold, not including the sales on his new book.

Dumas' "The Three Musketeers" has had no other illustrator who has caught the spirit of the romance so well as the great French artist, Maurice Leloir. His illustrations stand unquestionably among the great visualizations of literary masterpieces, depicting all the movement, exuberance, diversity of characterization, the swaggering vitality of Dumas' romantic pages. In response to popular interest in the illustrations D. Appleton & Co. are publishing this week the copyright edition of "The Three Musketeers," translated by William Robson, in one volume, with the complete set of the Leloir illustrations, 250 in all, each one of which is engraved in wood by J. Huyot.

Maxim Gorky is at present in the Schwarzwald, his health broken after four years of revolution and terrible privations in Russia. So undermined has been his health that he is almost wrecked now. A friend writes that the physician who treats Gorky reports that a few months further in the Schwarzwald will bring about his recovery, however. Continuing, this friend says: "Gorky tells horrible things about Russia and about the life there. He is not in sympathy with the government which rules Russia today and he told me that he will never return to Russia." Gorky's great novel, "Mother," that supreme depiction of the terrific struggle against the Czar's autocracy, has just been published by the Appletons with a special introduction by Charles Edward Russell.

"The Singer and His Art," the book by Thaddeus Wronski, distinguished singer and teacher, just published by the Appletons, is awakening much interest in vocal circles, and particularly among the opera singers, whose three-fold art (singing, acting, make-up) it analyzes. Giulio Gatti-Casazza, director of the Metropolitan Opera Company, in accepting the dedication of the volume, expressed his appreciation of it as a "valuable manual." A statement signed by a formidable array of the artists of the Metropolitan Opera Company has declared that it contains most logical ideas and practical professional theories for the singer and that "the parts on mimicry and the art of make-up represent a most serious work in this line and their value to the professional world is beyond estimation." This is signed by such artists as De Luca, Amato, Danise, Didur, Delaunais, and others.

From Dorchester, the home of Thomas Hardy, came a letter to the Harpers, who publish the great English author's works, describing him as he appears to an outsider today: "Mr. Hardy leads a quiet life in the country, living a mile from the county town of Dorchester. He sees a few people, and does not lead, by any means, a life of seclusion. He is visited at intervals by many of his friends—particularly poets, also the leading dramatists, novelists, and painters of the day. Several of Mr. Hardy's literary friends make a point of visiting him at regular intervals, coming from London for that purpose. Mr. Hardy is in perfect health, his hearing is keen, his sight is good, and he suffers from none of the infirmities of old age. He takes a daily walk—sometimes of considerable length, generally accompanied by his dog Wessex, and by Mrs. Hardy, who is also a good walker. During the summer Mr. Hardy cycles, but not so frequently as formerly, nor for such long distances. Now and again he assists in some enterprise that appeals to him. He is now thinking of going to Bath to attend the presentation of the freedom of that city to Mr. Frederick Harrison.

Mr. Drinkwater seems to have a distinct flair for the language of other periods. Even since the days of "Abraham Lincoln" colloquial language has changed. But it is in such plays as "Mary Stuart" or "Oliver Cromwell" that his skilful use of the language of other centuries is the most noticeable. The London Spectator comments on the fact that he uses "only words common both to the reader's and the subject's epoch." This eliminates the "Godzooks" the "What Ho's!" of the romantic "atmospheric" novel, but it creates a tense reality both to character and to times.

Two plays in verse by John Masefield have just been published by the Macmillan Company. "Esther" Mr. Masefield adapted from Racine for production by a small company of amateurs in a Berkshire village, and the story of Ahasuerus' queen loses none of its perennial charm and power under the English poet's hand. The choruses and one entire act were added by Mr. Masefield; the rest of the play is a free poetical version of Racine. Racine's "Berenice" Masefield has translated into verse whose flexibility makes it a wonderful medium for the story of the hopeless passion of Titus and Queen Berenice.

Among the spring books which are now on the presses of Doubleday, Page & Co. are several of unusual distinction, one of which is a translation of "The Legend of Eulenspiegel and Lammie Goedzak," the famous old Flemish prose epic of Charles De Coster, printed and bound, according to a format designed by Claud Lovat Frazer, whose "The Beggar's Opera" was among the most beautiful books of the fall season. Another is Selma Lagerlöf's "The Outcast." Doubleday, Page & Co. will also publish "A Survey—Fifty-One Cartoons," by Max Beerbohm; a collection of O. Henry's hitherto unpublished letters, and "My Childhood," by John Burroughs.

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

The Story of the Exposition.

Every one who regretted in 1915 that the nature of an exposition was transitory may now console himself with "The Story of the Exposition," by Frank Morton Todd. For Mr. Todd's colossal work seems to have done what the builders of the Panama-Pacific Exposition could not do. He has crystallized the beauty and the achievement for which the exposition stood.

"The Story of the Exposition" is told in five rather large, heavy volumes. But when one sees the completion of the record he realizes that this was not a case for compactness. Mr. Todd goes to the beginnings of things with Balboa's discovery of the Pacific in 1513—the anniversary of which, we are reminded, the exposition partly celebrated. The author also goes thoroughly into the Panama Canal. In fact, his history of the project of the Canal and its final accomplishment is as authentic a record as is likely to be found.

For the average possessor of the books the illustrations are probably the greatest charm. There is not a lovely or important view of the exposition grounds, architectural vistas, courts, fountains, or sculpture that has been omitted. Many are in color. But the more satisfactory are the half-tone reproductions of photographs. Nor is it only the exterior of the exposition that has been preserved. It would seem that everything from the English pottery exhibit to the hookworm display via the Diesel engine has been photographed for this inclusive record of the San Francisco Fair. In fact one is apt to get a more comprehensive idea of what the P. P. I. E. was like from these volumes than he did from the exposition itself.

Scarhaven Keep.

Another of Mr. J. S. Fletcher's detective stories, "Scarhaven Keep," has appeared. Mr. Fletcher is the mystery-story writer par excellence. He creates an eerie atmosphere in which nothing would be too astonishing to happen and he has the unusual gift, for a writer of detective yarns, of lifelike delineation of character.

The castle of Scarhaven Keep commanded a magnificent view of the North Sea and the Scottish border, and it was on the keep tower that Bassett Oliver was last seen. Oliver was a famous actor, the mystery of whose disappearance in this ancient sea-coast village supplies Mr. Fletcher and his readers with three hundred pages of sustained action. And of course there is the attendant love story.

The Everlasting Whisper.

Jackson Gregory has written another story of the West, staged this time in the mighty forests and ranges of the high Sierras. It is a story of romantic adventure and romantic love. The everlasting whisper is the call of the mountain and forest to the explorer-hero of the tale, who, of course, responds to his summons and finds love and adventure. The book is permeated with the atmosphere of the redwoods. It is a Western novel of the best sort.

THE EVERLASTING WHISPER. By Jackson Gregory. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons; $1.75.

The Cockpit.

When one thinks of Israel Zangwill it is to conjure up the image of a Jewish writer who is a proponent of Americanism. As his publishers point out, his term "the melting pot" has become a universally accepted synonym for the United States. And one might add, Zangwill himself is synonymous with Americanism of a certain type.

It is therefore with some surprise that Zangwill's readers encounter "The Cockpit," a romantic drama in three acts. The theme has been arrived at by taking that of the "Melting Pot"—the fusion of races in America—and turning it inside out. The result is the disintegrating of races in the Old World. We suspect the idea of having been rather mechanically produced.

Despite its sociological thesis, "The Cockpit" lives up to its claim of being romantic drama, since to the Anglo-Saxon reader nothing is more exotic or romantic than the Balkan States. It is of the texture of "Arms and the Man" and would make an equally good foundation for a romantic opera. Incidentally, one wonders if all dramatists have been bitten with Shavianism. "The Cockpit," from its dryly written stage business to its play on words and its self-willed heroine, might be the veritable production of Shaw in, say, a spasm of relaxation. As far as manner of writing goes, "The Cockpit" might have been written by Sir Harry Johnston, who as every one knows out-shaves Shaw when it comes to the Shavian style. The only point at which you become convinced that you are not having an indifferent Shaw foisted on you unawares is when, having finished "The Cockpit," you realize that you are no richer in knowledge of your fellow-man and woman than you were before.

THE COCKPIT. By Israel Zangwill. New York: The Macmillan Company; $1.60.

ROSTAND'S TRANSLATOR.

Henderson Daingerfield Norman, the translator of Macmillan's new edition of "The Plays of Edmond Rostand," had a unique inheritance and an unusual upbringing. She was born in Virginia and has spent much of her life in Kentucky. Her mother was "the author of nine children and several books." Her father, a lawyer, served as major in the Laurel Brigade of the Confederate army, and was at the time of his death the world's greatest authority on the breeding of thoroughbred horses. Her sister was the breeder of the Futurity winner, Step Lightly, and was chosen by Mr. Riddle as manager in Kentucky of Man o' War.

Of her early education Mrs. Norman writes: "Like most Virginia children, we had teachers and lessons at home, and when I went away to school it was not college, but Mrs. Dew's Episcopal Female Seminary. Most of my education comes just from reading with unflagging appetite everything I could lay hands on, as we all did in that satisfactory Virginia childhood when as soon as we could read (I don't remember when I couldn't) we were turned loose in a library that had the books gathered by four generations. We read Chaucer, for instance, when his spelling was no queerer than my own—and I didn't know till I grew up that anybody made school work of his English.

"The first recollection I have of French literature is when I was between five and seven. Those years a beloved great-uncle, Douglas Gray, was a member of our household. He was a French scholar, a real authority on certain matters of French history, and he read aloud to us some of the masterpieces of French literature, translating it as he went, and like the bookworm and philologist—in the literal sense—that he was, he often paused to show an eager little girl the relation between the French and English form of a word and to tell its history. It is to this uncle that I owe the impression that I remember the French Revolution—and by every test of actual memory that I know, I really do.

"If my translation of the beautiful plays makes English readers share my joy in them, it will be partly payment of my debt to Uncle Doug."

Henry James, writing of Rostand in the Critic, speaks of the English reader's missing "the bristling bravery of his verse, the general frolic of his vocabulary, especially under the happy crack of the whip of rhyme." He adds, "Monsieur Rostand without his virtuosity—with that element not rendered, or not caught—what sort of a Monsieur Rostand to excite enthusiasm is that? With what residuum does the magic work?"

The Chicago Evening Post, commenting on Mrs. Norman's translation, sums up, "All these effects the translator reproduces admirably, and what is more, she preserves the sweep of the thing."

The Origin of Martingale.

In the statement about submarines and their use, quoted by Lord Lee of Fareham to the embarrassment of the French from the writings of the suddenly and uncomfortably famous Commander Castex, there occurs the word "martingale" (says the New York Times). As employed by the defender of "Schrecklichkeit," it stood as a synonym or explanation of "system" and "instrument"—which arouses curiosity in those who are interested, not only in the meanings of words, but in the question of why they mean what they do.

In other days almost everybody knew that a "martingale" was part of a horse's harness—a double strap running from the girth upward between his front legs and attached to the bits. It confined the movements of the animal's head and was supposed to make control easier.

Another usage was nautical, the rope or chain supporting a jib-boom being also a "martingale," and again the idea was of something that restrains or supports.

A wholly different "martingale" was, and is, the simplest, the most popular and, though theoretically perfect, the most worthless of all the plans for "beating the bank" at Monte Carlo or elsewhere—the plan of doubling bets until one of them wins and then returning to the original unit. Why that should be called a martingale only gamblers know, though perhaps the idea of controlling fortune enters into it.

The lexicographers do not seem to be at all sure as to the derivation of "martingale." They know of an Italian "martingala," which is a sort of hose; of the same word in Spanish, which means a greave, and of another Spanish word, "almariaga," which is a bridle. None of these is very helpful toward settling why "martingale" means what it does, but it seems that the inhabitants of the French town of Martigues are called "Martigals," and if one of them first thought of holding a horse's head down by straps from his girth it would be quite natural for the name to pass to the device. Then the changing of "marti" and "gal" to "martin" and "gale" would be in accord with one of the commonest of linguistic adjustments.

That the monsters of the deep fight in groups as well as engage in personal encounters is testified to by Captain G. Evered Poole, a commissioner in the Gold Coast Colony, who writes the following to his brother concerning an experience during his voyage from England: "Between Sierra Leone and Sekondi we steamed through, for over an hour, a blood-red sea, and saw some hundreds of whales dead or dying on the surface of the water. Some were just able to move slowly along; few, if any, could move quickly. There must have been a sanguinary battle, supposed to have been put up by swordfish. It was a most appalling sight, and the extent of the bloody expanse must have represented the death of many more whales than were visible."

GOOD COMPANY, GOOD COMEDY.

At the Columbia they are offering capital entertainment this week with a Morosco "comedy of youth" called "Wait Till We're Married." We were obliged to wait until the very end before the interesting event took place, but the interim was most agreeably filled by a witty and jolly comedy acted by a company of excellent comedians. For though Terry Duffy—a most engaging youth and a charming comedian—is starred, every single one of the speaking company is of first-class material, and knows how to enact comedy in first-class style; and, furthermore, gives us first-class laughs.

Hutcheson Boyd and Rudolph Bunner, the two collaborating authors, are well aware that our theatre-going public of the lighter preferences likes youth, sentiment, laughter, democracy, more than a glimpse of the lives of the smart set, and pretty clothes, not to mention pretty girls. So they have given us all of these things, not to mention the wit and humor that sparkles in the dialogue of the play, which is confessed light, but wholly entertaining.

The main idea will recommend itself to that part of young America which elopes with chauffeur, or with the boss' heiress, and pet, youngest and most beautiful daughter.

Marion Livermore, niece and probable heiress of a rich and worldly aunt, has turned down the equally worldly young matrimonial candidate approved by her aunt in favor of a guileless young innocent who never drinks, smokes, or swears, and has principles rooted in granite.

The efforts of the worldly aunt and suitor to keep Marion in her own world and the complications resulting from Marion's wilfulness and Timothy's granite-bound principles unite to form the obstacles preventing the course of true love from running smoothly.

The sympathetic audience looks upon the interrupted love idyl with great enjoyment; for it amuses itself with the profound uncertainty in which it speculates, "Will she marry him? Will the authors let dear Terry, living frugally on $55 a week, marry Marion, whose clothes fairly smell of money? Marion, who belongs to those frivolous ranks of girlhood which live but for pleasure? But, on the other hand, Marion loves Tim, and Tim loves Marion." We remind ourselves that sapient playwrights who write to amuse never separate true lovers. And so we remain in a delightfully provocative state of uncertainty until the end.

Terry Duffy is a dear in the play, and one rather suspects that he is a dear out of it. He, in common with others of this company which is so astonishingly well provided with clever character actors, presents most skillfully, entertainingly, and, in Mr. Duffy's case, most winningly the characteristics of the guileless ruralite with whom the hitherto worldly Marion has incontinently fallen in love. Tim thinks slowly, and, in his countrified, semi-inarticulate way, speaks slowly. But his whole being radiates genuineness, youthful confidence in his ideals and simple worth.

Marion, played deliciously by Barbara Brown, a fascinating, boyishly slender, instinctively modish, and naturally irresistible piece of American girlhood, represents the girl who lives, or has hitherto lived, on the principle of having her own charming, wilful, perverse way; and very charmingly she sets about it. Mary Hill is the utility actress who knows her business perfectly; which, in this case, is to dress well and act out Aunt Kate's worldliness in a simple, natural manner.

Good-looking and dapper Ted W. Gibson also was at home in the delineation of a rather dandified scion of a wealthy family who is a devotee of the smart world: just a touch more of humor needed, though, to make the best of his very juicy and well-spoken lines. William Austin, a clever comedian in a butler part, never lost a point.

Fannie Yantis and Marie Van Tassel did such clever work in presenting the two contrasting types of the country aunts, the one severely natural, the other an amusing burlesque, that they woke perpetual ripples of laughter at everything they did; and Andrew Arbuckle, a type of the seasoned, sophisticated player, who does everything competently, and has natural humor besides, completed this cast of entertaining efficiency.

In the present phase of theatricals we see much immature acting on our local stage; and, although "Wait Till We're Married" offers purely light-minded entertainment, it was done with such finish in the comedy acting that I found myself studying with fascination the method with which they accomplished their effects, if it was only the way Aunt Kate walked idly across the room and smelled the flowers, as she awaited the appearance of the butler she had summoned, or the method with which Marshall dilated his eyes and respectfully stressed his deferential attitude as he scored one of his numerous points.

As for Barbara Brown, she was, aside from her natural and acquired ability to shine as a stage ornament, just fascinating to look at. She has a pretty, provocative smile, lead-pencil slenderness, and was born stylish. She is more piquant than pretty, but she is pretty anyway. Any one is pretty who succeeds in keeping every eye firmly riveted upon her with complete satisfaction. This typical young blossom of American girlhood succeeded in looking trim and trim in pink gingham, and even in khaki knickers; and that's a feat.

The Columbia, by the way, has evidently made a big haul with "The London Follies," which opens at that theatre on the 12th of February. A lot of big things are promised us in connection with it, among them Harry Tate, the English comedian, who has made good with American audiences. But what is surprising is that this English organization, with its seventy revue stars, its forty tried and tested beauties, and its three carloads of scenery, costumes, and effects, will come here when so many of the big Eastern managers are cutting us, and of course many big cities much nearer to them than us, completely off their circuit.

There is, however, an explanation; one which shows that the many San Franciscans who particularly favor this kind of stage entertainment are having a big streak of luck.

Albert de Courville, known as the Ziegfeld of London and Paris, who bosses this production of such magnitude, took it to Canada. But he also brought out his "Pins and Needles" company. At a date that he had set for taking his "London Follies" to New York on his return route the "Pins and Needles" would be occupying the New York theatre at which the "Follies" were to appear. Being a true general in the theatrical world De Courville immediately cast a pair of speculative orbs San Franciscowards; hence our stroke of luck.

It is something unusual, in fact I believe it has never been done before, this bringing a London "Revue" to America; and we will be immensely interested in making comparisons.

Harry Tate's name is familiar to devoted Orpheumites in connection with his golfing and fishing acts; but he himself has never acted them in this country outside of New York. He will give here in San Francisco, not only the golfing scene, but also some of his stage comicallities derived from experiences in motoring.

"THE GAY LORD QUEX."

Quite a proportion of Pinero's plays are written with "a purpose"; such as "The Profligate," "Iris," which is a progenitor of Walter's "Easiest Way," "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray," and so on. But, in the midst of his big vogue, when every play, as it dropped from his busy pen, was immediately brought out on the London boards, and the majority of them faithfully repeated in New York, he wrote "The Gay Lord Quex" entirely for the "kick" it gave his appreciators.

The kick comes in the third and culminating act, when Sophy Fullgarney, manuevering to break off the match between her dearly loved foster sister, Muriel, and Lord Quex, up to the last month or so the gayest rake in London, but now preparing for marriage and the reforming process, are mutually entrapped.

Sophy, the fashionable manicure, and Lord Quex are the protagonists in the play. Pinero made his special effort on Sophy. Part of the kick, indeed, to the sated worldlings of London came from this intimate study of a promoted lady's maid, who had grown rich on her strictly respectable manicuring parlors, whose affections were strong and true, but who remained as ordinary as her forbears.

The rest of the kick lay in the fact that it was a duchess of impeccable reputation who was making the last assault on Quex's newly-acquired virtue by trying to fan the embers of an old intrigue.

The play became one of the most widely known and most talked of among Pinero's long list of invariably interesting comedies and drawing-room dramas; the English playwright being wont, it will be remembered, to locate his plays in the most socially exclusive circles. In his day regarded as the best technician among English-speaking dramatists, Pinero's greatest deficiency was that of failing to evolve many characters that won the love and sympathy of the audience; as the very successful old uncle did, for instance, in his pretty comedy, "Liberty Hall." The worldly tone of a majority of his plays, the elegance and social smartness of his witty worldlings, was always irreproachably done, and, transporting us in America to the world of London fashionable folk in which we have always been so interested, entertained us in the highest degree.

"The Gay Lord Quex," however, demonstrates this lacking quality in Pinero. In spite of the kick we get from the big sensation in the third act, there is no one in the play that touches our heart. Lord Quex's manners are beautiful, but he is illegitimately trying to snatch a fair and fresh blossom rightly belonging to younger hands. Besides, he consorts with a shaky libertine who is becoming, from his excesses, almost doddering at the age of forty-eight.

Muriel is a graceful shadow; Captain Bastling a mere accessory. The duchess interests us, because she is a romantic voluptuary, guarding her reputation, nevertheless, with religious devotion. Yes, the duchess is a big part of the kick.

But, somehow, we don't like Sophy; loyal, true-hearted Sophy; and we never did. Her methods are objectionable, and we can't get by that. But Sophy is a creation. Sophy and the duchess, indeed, the two kick-makers, are the creations of the play.

Mr. Maitland's players, as a general thing, are less at home in drawing-room plays than in less sophisticated atmospheres. But Pinero's technique, and his finished and concise dialogue, added to the situations always so cleverly arranged by him, helped them, and they dealt creditably with their task.

Mr. Maitland and Mr. Cunningham—who is continuing his career of invariable dependableness—gave the necessary tone of rather heartless worldliness to the two rakes, and Dorothy Wetmore did commendable work as the duchess. Margaret Smith, by the way, proved herself able, in the rôle of Mrs. Jack Eden, to assume something of the tone and manner of a stage élégante.

Lea Penman, I thought, played the rôle of Sophy at such a feverish tempo that she deprived the character of naturalness. But she did suggest that flavor of ordinariness appropriate to Sophy, and the Misses Critenden and Christianson united with her in endowing the manicure parlors with the appropriate atmosphere.

The big scene wasn't quite as big as in past days. But perhaps, regarded from a more modern standpoint, it went with a greater adherence to nature. For we have learned, in modern theatreland, that people do not always yell and make extravagant demonstrations when they are excited.

THE ORPHEUM.

I should unhesitatingly say that William Gaxton is the hit of the week at the Orpheum. To those who had not read their program he provided a surprise, for, after beginning as a monologist—when, by the way, his voice did not always rise above an inconveniently intrusive orchestra—he ended up by giving us a highly entertaining and well-acted playlet.

Two men make a wager. They both admit that it is as easy as rolling off a log to kiss a girl—with her consent—after a fifteen-minute interview. But the knotty point is to make her kiss you voluntarily within the same limit of time. "The modern young man"—played by Mr. Gaxton—had some job laid out for him, and we may imagine the breathless interest with which the audience, male and female, watched the modern young man at work.

Mr. Gaxton had had the common sense to gather a good company around him. Every blessed one of them did their job cleverly, the star, of course, inspiring them by the naturalness and deliberation of his acting. For he did not make it farcical. The people, carefully selected for their varying types, seemed real, and the episode excited so much interest and amusement that William Gaxton and his playlet became the hit of the performance. Hence his irruption in another act, when he made nonsensical fun with the Cameron Sisters half or three-quarters of an hour later. Whenever a performer breaks into another act like that it is because the management knows that he has become a pet, and the audience will be well pleased to have more of him.

It seemed to me that Claudius and 'Scarlet in "The Call of the 'Sixties" dragged their tempo so calamitously that it lessened the enjoyment of what otherwise would have been a very successful act. For audiences always love the revival of old songs, and otherwise the pair played their mandolins with snap and splendid rhythm.

The Cameron Sisters in a series of dainty costumes pleased extremely by their dancing. Lydell and Macy are familiar as old men types, but Lydell does his job so well that it is really quite impossible to believe that there is youth under that make-up until he begins to dance. Eddie Buzzell, in a very elaborate act, shows ability in mingling country janness and metropolitan jauntiness, and has plenty of smart girls to help him out. Other acts are the usual thing, and enjoyed as usual.

THE MINSTREL POET.

Who ever heard a man wishing he was a woman? Who hasn't heard a woman wishing she was a man? For how could women ever become joyful vagrants over the face of the earth, like Vachel Lindsay and Stephen Graham; the two vagabond poets who tramp their way over far and away spaces, asking for a meal and a night's lodging, and returning the dole in the shape of poetry or poetic literature?

Vachel Lindsay, the vagabond poet, as his friends call him, has vagabonded to California again. The lure of our sunny state is felt also by his pal, Stephen Graham, who, debarred from hobnobbing his way over the Russian steppes he has always so dearly loved, is also at present in California.

There was quite a gathering of the clans in the Paul Elder Gallery last week to hear the minstrel poet chant his lays. He did not disappoint his audience.

In conventional costume and with the conventional platform manner the poet expressed some of his unconventional views, one of which is that as poetry has its own music it should never be set to music. Musical notation, he feels, drowns the verbal music of the poetry; although once or twice, in his chantings of his own verse, the poet fell into something of the simple musical notation similar to that a priest uses in conducting a mass.

Mr. Lindsay's poetry reflects the varied impressions stored in his mind by his unconventional wanderings. With his senses alert to enjoy, his intelligence to observe and record, and his heart, full of a warm humanity, to feel, he accumulates a rich soil compounded of myriad experiences, out of which grow the wild flowers of his fancy.

His poetry is full of natural music, and all this he brings out as he sings it, for he does not employ the monotonous Tennysonian chant that has been described to us by friends of the English bard. His voice sinks to a whisper or swells to a clarion note, or measures off the refrains in a quick, staccato chanting. He is even melodramatic in his rendering of the old darky preacher's "Down to de debil."

One thinks, as he sings of Johnny Appleseed, who

To the farthest West has followed the sun,

Winged and wonder-crested;
Bare-footed, bare-armed, and bare-breasted, wandering over the vast, lonely forests of the new world, "This poet could only spring out of American soil." But in "The Chinese Night-ingle" and the "Gipsy Fiddles" his imagination transplants us to the Orient, and with equal vividness he paints innumerable pictures of the scattered tribes of remote aliens.
Verbal music is what he keenly feels, and preaches, and creates. And in thus chanting of his poems he is reviving the primitive, Homeric art, and causing us to realize how well-founded is that instinct which impels us to murmur, if only for our own ears, the poems which please us. For poetry was created to be heard as plays to be acted and songs to be sung. And many poems are songs.

Historic Irish Paintings.
Sir John Lavery was in the gallery at the House of Lords painting on a small box easel the historic scene below him when Lord Morley was moving the acceptance of the treaty with Ireland (although in Parliamentary phraseology he was doing something quite different), and the chamber that had echoed so often to the ancient quarrel was quiet and expectant like a harbor watching a strange ship coming in after a terrible voyage.
It is taken that the outcome of Sir John Lavery's sketch will be another addition to his series of historical Irish pictures, in which he has been engaged from time to time during the last five years. They began, I think, with his picture of the trial of Roger Casement, and include pictures of the lying-in-state of the lord mayor of Cork and Archbishop Mannix blessing the Irish flag.
He has painted the portraits of Messrs. De Valera, Arthur Griffith, Michael Collins, Duggan, Gavan Duffy, Mrs. MacSweeney, Archbishop Mannix, Cardinal Logue, and several other prominent Irishmen. His portrait of Mr. De Valera is at present in the Paris Salon. It is stated in Ireland that it is the intention of Sir John to present the whole historic series to the Irish nation.—Manchester Guardian.

The Columbia Theatre.
Oliver Morosco's laugh-a-minute comedy, "Wait Till We're Married," begins its second and last week at the Columbia Theatre Monday night, February 6th. The farce is scoring a big hit in San Francisco, if one may judge from the hilarity of the audience from the start of the play to the final curtain.
The comedy is built on the difficulties encountered by a pair of young lovers from opposed walks of life. The action starts in a Long Island villa, in surroundings of wealth and fashion, and ends in a humble cottage on Staten Island. The play was written for laughs and is said to be one of the cleanest comedies seen here in sometime.
Mr. Morosco has sent the original company intact from the Playhouse, New York, where it has been playing since last August. The chief rôle is played by Terry Duffy, who has the naturalness and sincerity, along with the youth that belongs to the part. The rest of company comprises such sterling actors as Ted W. Gibson, Barbara Brown, Reynolds Denniston, Marie Van Tassel, William Austin, Fanny Yantis, Mary Hill, and Maxwell Paley.

The Maitland Playhouse.
"The Rainbow," a clever, wholesome comedy in which Henry Miller and Ruth Chatterton starred, will be the Maitland Playhouse offering for the week commencing Monday night. With the stars named above in the leading rôles "The Rainbow" achieved a notable success, and its handling with Arthur Maitland and Lea Penman in leading rôles is assurance to local audiences that the piece will be well-starred. It is a fitting play for the Stockton Street house and promises a strong performance.
Arthur Wing Pinero's sterling drama, "The Gay Lord Quex," that opened Monday night at the Maitland, has caught the fancy of theatre-goers. It is one of the strongest of the dramas offered this year at the Stockton Street house. It will close with the Saturday matinee and evening performances.

The Players Theatre.
This week the Players Theatre presents a triple bill of new plays, two of which have not been played on any stage. They are "Exiles," by Dan Totheroh, author of "Tampela," and "Charles, the Simple," a tragedy of tenth-century France, by Benjamin A. Purrington, who will play his own leading part.
Dan Totheroh will support Mabel Gump, who will play the leading rôle in "Exiles," a dramatic play of the South Seas. Others in the cast of "Exiles" are Léon Bowen, Leo Cunningham, Katharine Edson, Kathleen Rucker, and Alice Barkley.
The third play on the bill is Alice Gerstenberg's comedy, "14."
It is announced that Reginald Travers, who is now on his vacation, will return shortly to conduct rehearsals of Gilbert and Sullivan's "The Sorcerers." Frank Darien, the well-known stage veteran, will direct all productions at the Players until his return.

The Orpheum.
The Four Marx Brothers, superior entertainers, are coming to the Orpheum next week in a new musical piece entitled "On the Balcony." The four brothers—Herbert, Julius, Arthur, and Leonard—have made for themselves an enviable reputation in vaudeville. In their latest vehicle, which is built entirely for laughing purposes, these accomplished funsters have just the sort of act to bring out the best that is in them. Supported by a company of twelve people, they present their offering in rapid-fire fashion, flashing in and out from one funny situation to another until the curtain is rung down at the finish.
Lydia Barry is a fine example of the theory of heredity. Her father before her was one of the best comedians of his day. Her songs are always good, and she sings them perfectly.
Innis Brothers intend to depict in the amusing little musical duologue, "The Men About Town," the hick's idea of being well dressed and of the society manner. They play every line for a laugh.
"Listen Bertie." It doesn't matter whether or not Bertie listens, but the Lane and Byron audiences will be sure to listen. "Listen Bertie" is the title of the "nut" act offered by these eccentric comedians.
The more there is put into a skit the more will be gotten out of it. Lang and Vernon are master builders. Their pertinent idea is told in their skit, "Who Is Your Boss?" and their construction has been made with songs, chatter, and whistling.
The La Pilarica Trio come from Spain, where they enjoyed favor in King Alfonso's court. Viela Victoria, one of its members, is said to be the most fascinating of Spanish dancers. Even Carmencita in her prime was not more bewitching than this fiery little dancing doll from old Madrid, and with her two associates the fame of the La Pilarica Trio has spread all over the world.
Garcinetti Brothers are primarily acrobats and trampoline performers, and in these capacities they do remarkably clever work. The distinguishing feature in their performance, however, is their hat-throwing. The brothers stand at either side of the stage and cast hats at each other. These invariably land where the hat is supposed to be worn and at various rakish angles.

Lydell and Macy are the only holdover for the coming week and their clever comedy characterizations have been a delight to audiences during the past week.

The London Follies Coming.
A glimpse of sunshine in the gloom caused by Flo Ziegfeld's announcement that he will confine his producing activities to London hereafter, is the news that Albert de Courville, known along Broadway as "the Ziegfeld of England," has decided to make New York his headquarters in the future, and has already brought over his two greatest successes, "The London Follies," with Harry Tate, which comes to the Columbia Theatre for eight days, commencing Sunday, February 12th, and "Pins and Needles," now playing at the Shubert Theatre, New York.
"The London Follies" company of seventy has just completed a record-breaking tour of Canada, including all the larger cities from Montreal to Vancouver. It was intended that the company should open in New York immediately after this tour was completed, but the scarcity of attractions of the revue type on the Coast decided to the management to make a tour of California before returning East.
"The London Follies" American tour opened in Seattle on New Year's Day, and judging from the reception accorded the company in the Northwest, the production is one of the few strong enough to attract large audiences without having first made a Broadway reputation.

Warfield Coming.
David Warfield's reappearance this season in David Belasco's masterly play, "The Return of Peter Grimm," is in response to a public demand for a revival of this unusual drama. Wherever Mr. Warfield has appeared during the past three or four seasons both critics and playgoers have asked that "The Return of Peter Grimm" be restored to the stage. That the revival is most timely has already been proved by the interest that is manifested in the coming engagement at the Columbia Theatre two weeks hence.

Shaw and Ibsen.
Two strong plays are promised for the Maitland Playhouse within the near future. Arthur Maitland announces the coming of "The Vikings," by Henrik Ibsen, one of the Ibsen plays that has never before been seen in San Francisco. It is less sombre than the average run of Ibsen plays.
George Bernard Shaw's strong play, "Man and Superman," is to be repeated at the Maitland. It proved one of the best cards of the season when it was given.

Arthur Raffalovich.
It is announced from Paris that Arthur Raffalovich died there on December 24th at the age of sixty-eight (says the New York Times). He had long been a well-known economist in the Parisian circle which included such writers and statisticians as Leroy-Beaulieu, Yves Guyot, and other thinkers of the older generation. He was born at Odessa in 1853, but was educated in Paris, where he spent most of his life. In 1888 he was made financial editor of the Journal des Débats, the active work of which he surrendered in his later years, but with which he maintained a journalistic connection up to the time of his death.

His close knowledge of both Russian and French finance led to his appointment, first as privy councillor of the Russian government, then as member of the finance ministry's council; and when Witte was carrying through his reform of the Russian currency, in connection with the placing of large Russian loans on the French market, Raffalovich was appointed commercial attaché to the Russian Imperial Embassy at Paris, where for many years he practically filled the duties of financial agent for the Russian government. M. Raffalovich was well known in both financial and political circles of Paris, where he enjoyed wide personal respect because of the unflinching rectitude of his private conduct and official actions during a period when financial scandal was frequent both in French finance and in the Franco-Russian relations.

He was at all times more intimately devoted to economic science than to practical participation in financial affairs outside of his government's interest, and had written widely on the subject. His Marché Financier, published annually during many years, was perhaps the most complete review issued in Europe, covering the occurrences of a past year in the trade, markets, and public finances of all the European countries and of the United States. To the discussion of the affairs of every country he brought a dispassionate economic view and a remarkably complete knowledge of the facts. He was a constant writer for the economic journals of Paris, discussing especially the large financial problems of the day. His last work, written in collaboration with Yves Guyot, dealt with the question of inflation and deflation, and was noteworthy for its insistence on the adherence by France in particular to the old-time principles of sound currency and the gold standard. Among the personal eccentricities of the man was the fact that, although he spoke three languages with perfect freedom, he was never able to converse in his mother tongue, though reading without difficulty publications in the Russian language.

A religious "revival" has commenced among the fisher people on the east coast, from Grimsby to John o' Groats (says the Manchester Guardian). It is difficult to say where the revival originated, and its effects are most noticeable in the villages on the south of the Moray Firth and the Aberdeenshire coast north of Aberdeen. Observers say the revival is much more extensive than that led in Wales in 1904-5 by Evan Roberts. Prayer-meetings lasting many hours are held nightly, the mission halls generally being full. The kinemas and public houses are in consequence nearly empty, and some of the former have had to close down. Strangers and fellow-villagers are systematically stopped in the streets and asked if they have been saved. Even motorists in some villages are held up by the more fervent. One serious aspect of the revival is its effect on the minds of the people. Already six persons, mostly young men and women, have been removed to hospitals and institutions for the insane, and in the event of the revival continuing much longer this number may, it is feared, swell.

The most important problem before the feminists now is whether or not a woman should take her husband's name. The matter, which even takes precedence over the new fight for equal rights throughout is solved by a good many suffragettes by the omission of the husband. That of course simplifies matters. If one has not got a husband there is no challenging one against the right to one's own name. Other ladies we suspect of taking husbands in a combative spirit. Their argument is that there is no credit in keeping their maiden name if they have no other. And there is a lot to be said for that stand, too. If the ideal suffragette remains celibate she will always be in doubt whether or no she has had equal rights in everything. There is the matter of the name! Perhaps she would not have got away with it. And so she must eventually die dissatisfied, not quite content that she has wrested every right from man and made it hers. Clearly the wise suffragette takes a spouse and declines his name. That way lies power for the cause. Nor is she merely interested in party propaganda. She is altruistic. She hopes to see the day when all women—even the unworthy unfeminist albeit feminine ones—cling to their own paternal cognomen even as in the old days our female ancestors clung with pardonable pride to the appellation "Mrs." Gone are the days when a woman marries merely to acquire the handle "Mistress." They are no longer primarily proud of being some one or other's mistress. The stronger sex—for we resignedly suppose that that is what it has come to—now marry quite incidentally, nonchalantly, even as men have married of yore. If she has an ulterior motif at all, it is to keep her own name.

A New York professor urges girl graduates "to shun becoming flappers." Just how a college graduate could become a flapper is not explained by the savant, though we are sure it would take an expert in the fourth dimension to accomplish the feat. We have heard of people seeking the fountain of youth. But until now no one—not even a professor—has thought it worth while to warn people against finding the rejuvenating fluid. The present injunction to college graduates sounds dangerously like it, though. Many a staid graduate student, and perhaps some who are not so staid, wish they were flappers again, but surely few of them are foolish enough to attempt the masquerade. A woman may shed ten years after she is thirty. But there are few indeed of twenty-five who can pretend to fifteen—and that or thereabouts is the authentic age of a flapper. Any one older than the sub-deb strata who appropriates the title is merely repeating the age-old fallacy of her sex—lying about her age and thinking she is getting away with it. Surely the professor meant to urge the girl graduate from imitating the flapper, and not from becoming one.

Isadora Duncan is said to have danced before the windows of Lenin in Moscow the other day. This is not really surprising, since Isadora announced her sympathy with the new Russian government some time ago. It is rather inconsistent, though, in view of her having danced the "Marseillaise" before the windows of Mr. Venizelos during the war. However, a dancer is by nature a temperamental sort of creature. Art would doubtless be throttled by strict regard for political principle. It is enough that Venizelos inspired Mme. Duncan some years ago and that Lenin has done so now. Truly, those gentlemen have not lived in vain. The tale is told that a friend of Raymund Duncan, the dancer's brother, was struck by Isadora's political infidelity. He spoke to Raymund about it. "Why," said the unsympathetic brother, "Isadora's right foot never knows what the left foot dances."

Admirers of "Elizabeth and Her German Garden" will be interested in the subsequent career of the talented authoress, who is now Countess Russell, the third wife of that Earl Russell, John Francis Stanley, who was hailed before the House of Lords in 1907 for obtaining a divorce in Reno after it had been denied him in London. He subsequently made his peace and now sits in "the Lords." Lord Russell is a man of letters, and it was their mutual literary tastes that first drew the Countess von Arnim and him together. The friendship, bookish at first, later took a romantic form. The Russells maintain a home in Mayfair, which is one of the popular literary centres of London. About fifteen years ago the countess, then the Countess von Arnim, made a visit of some length to Washington and was entertained at the Austro-Hungarian Embassy by Baroness von Hengelmüller. Count Arnim, known to literary fame as "the man of wrath," was a territorial magnate of the Baltic section of the former Prussian kingdom. The count died in 1910. The son, Count August von Arnim, holds a position under the republican government of the Baltic regions. Elizabeth is now in possession of as glorious a garden near Chichester off Brighton as that which she made famous off the Baltic Sea.

About Princess Bibesco.

Prince and Princess Bibesco were in New York the early part of January attending the fashion show, which was under the patronage of Queen Marie of Roumania, and the proceeds of which are to swell the fund for the orphans and ailing of that stricken land. The fashion show was in every respect an artistic success, the sale of Roumanian peasant embroideries and laces bringing the most generous prices.

The princess is entertaining her mother, Mrs. Asquith, who plans to remain in this country six or eight weeks. Washington is awaiting the arrival of this celebrated public woman and author with keen anticipation. She will visit some of the resorts along the Atlantic seaboard, probably those in Florida and South Carolina and Georgia. The Roumanian minister would not have the leisure to accompany her on a long tour, like to California or the far South, and the princess is tied up with social engagements, but will probably make the Florida trips with her mother.

Some of the short stories from the volume recently published by Elizabeth Bibesco are finding their way into popular magazines and giving their readers a glance at the themes which London of today considers vital. The tales are not deemed by their Washington readers as of consuming interest, being principally of the psycho-analytical kind, which is the rage of Europe, but not so universal on this side of the Atlantic.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

In an East End school a mistress was reading to her class Shelley's "Ode to a Skylark." To test the intelligence of her scholars she asked if they could put into different words, expressing the same meaning, the line, "Hail to thee, blithe spirit—bird thou never wert." An arm shot up from the back row. "Well, Johnny, let us hear how you would put it." "Hi, cocky. You aint no blinkin' bird."

"He's perfectly quiet," remarked the man to the two girls who were hiring a pony and trap. "Only you must take care to keep the rein off his tail." "We won't forget," they said. When they returned he asked them how they had got on. "Splendidly!" they exclaimed. "We had one sharp shower, but we took it in turn to hold the umbrella over the horse's tail, so there was no real danger."

Wishing to give his Scotch steward a treat a man invited him to London, and on the night after his arrival took him to a hotel to dine. During the early part of the dinner the steward was noticed to help himself very liberally to the champagne, glass after glass of the wine disappearing. Still he seemed very downhearted and morose. Presently he was heard to remark, "Well, I hope they'll not be very long w' the whisky, as I dinna get on verra weel w' these mineral waters."

A railway director rebuked a ticket collector who allowed him to go through the gate without producing his pass. "No matter if you do know who I am," he said, in reply to the collector's excuse; "I am entitled to ride free only when I am traveling with that pass. You don't know whether I have it or not." The collector, nettled into action, demanded to see the pass. "That's right," exclaimed the director. "Here—why—where—well, I declare. I must have left it at the office." "Then you'll have to pay your fare," responded the collector, grimly. And he did.

Charlie Chaplin said at a Los Angeles reception: "My very best compliment was made to me by a little Philadelphia girl. One evening, after her prayers were finished, she turned to her mother and asked: 'Mama, will I go to heaven when I die?' 'Yes, dear,' said her mother, 'if you're good and always do what mama tells you.' 'And will you go to heaven when you die, mama?' 'Yes, of course.' 'And will papa go to heaven?' 'I—ere—hope so, darling.' 'Mama, will Charlie Chaplin go to heaven when he dies?' 'Oh, I guess so.' The little girl in her long white night gown clapped her hands and jumped up and down ecstatically: 'Oh, mama,' she said, 'won't God laugh!'"

Lord Northcliffe, during his American visit, had little to say in favor of prohibition. "Show me prohibition," he would observe, "and I'll talk about it." Like the Missourian, Lord Northcliffe wanted to be shown. "Your Volstead Act," he said in New York one day, "has made lawbreakers and hypocrites of all of you. A Fifth Avenue millionaire handed me recently a letter he had just received from the freight department of a railroad. 'Read this,' he chuckled, and I read: 'Dear Sir—Will you please send without delay for the three packing cases of hymnals awaiting you here, as two are leaking badly, while an unknown tramp broke into the third last night during the small hours and was found by our men this morning in a disgusting condition?'"

Past stall after stall went the rich merchant, followed by a smart footman in livery, for the annual bazaar was in full swing. "Ah, Mr. Swankington," gushed a pretty girl at one of the stalls, "what are you going to buy? Auntie and I are in charge of this stall. We have cushions, pen wipers, and all sorts of—." "There's one thing I should like to buy," said the amorous visitor. "Do you sell kisses at your stall?" "Oh, certainly," came the prompt reply. "A sovereign each." "Right!" said the aristocrat. "I'll take two, please." "Auntie," cried the wily damsel, "forward, please. Two kisses for this gentleman." For a moment the wealthy one was nonplussed, but only for a moment. He turned suddenly to his footman. "James," he said coolly, "just take this purchase, please."

A dairy farmer living in a small town was recently summoned to appear before the local magistrate on a charge of selling butter under weight. The complainant was the village baker, who felt he was being wronged when he discovered that every pound of the farmer's butter fell below the weight that a pound ought to be. "Have you a pair of scales?" asked the magistrate of the farmer. "Yes, your honor." "And weights?" "No, your honor, I have no weights." "You have no weights! How, then, can you weigh your butter?" "That is very simple, your honor. Since the baker has bought his butter from me, I buy my bread from him, and his one-pound loaves serves me as weights to weigh my butter. If the butter does not weigh what it should, it is the baker's fault, and not mine, you see."

Standing on the slippery pavement of a small Southern town one rainy night, like sailors on a reeling deck, they were discussing a member of their party who had to retire from the scene of action. The principal speaker in the group appeared to be having some difficulty in keeping his footing on the swaying pavement. The buildings on either side bowed and rocked. The telephone poles did some sort of contortionist stunt, and even his voice was a bit thick. "Where's Sam?" another member of the group asked him. "We took him home," the first speaker informed him between hiccoughs. "Was he drunk?" "Drunk? It took three of us to get his hat in the car."

An eminent judge traveling in a first-class car was annoyed by a stranger who entered and lighted a strong cigar. The judge remonstrated. The stranger ignored him, whereupon the judge took out his card and handed it to the fellow. The stranger put the card in his pocket, blew a puff in the great man's face, and went on smoking. When the train stopped, the raging judge rose as the stranger slipped out of the coach and vanished. "Follow that man!" roared the judge to a porter. "Get his name and address. Quick!" In a minute or so the porter returned, rather scared. "I shouldn't go any farther with the case if I were you, sir," he said. "Do you know who the gentleman is?" And the porter handed the judge his own card.

THE MERRY MUSE.

The White Pearl.

A-many, many years ago
The Female rated rather low.
A diff'rent creature—one might say—
From that fair thing we see today.

She had to work much harder then,
Persuaded often by rough men,
Who daily grew in strength and size
By dint of healthy exercise.

But, ever crafty and alert,
The cunning creature learned to flirt,
And so, with artful coquetties,
Soon had her keeper on his knees.

With rapid strides she grew in grace
Until she filled a lofty place,
Not on, but just behind the Throne,
To rule the ruler—though unknown.

The consequence—'tis plain to see—
Mere Bagatelle for such as she:
Full many a King did blush unseen
In the effulgence of his Queen.

And now, victorious at last,
She rises from a dismal past:
The trapper's caught in his own trap—
She's all but pushed Man off the map.

Oregon's Ocean Bed.

Scientific societies are beginning to pay a good deal of attention to central Oregon's great ocean bed, dry now for many thousands of years (says the Portland Oregonian). During the past year fully a dozen expeditions visited the huge inland sea that extended over hundreds of square miles on the upper reaches of the Crooked River.

Just to stand in the dry bed of the sea or at points where the waves once washed the shore and where the marks of the tide are plain is a unique experience. It's an astounding country, every rock seemingly hiding fossil evidence of some nature, for at random any ordinary looking outcrop or boulder will reveal clams, oysters, boring shellfish, or seaweed impressions. Your head reels as you try and think back, centuries and tens and hundreds of centuries before, and see this vast expanse of sand, sagebrush, and rocks as a turbulent tropical ocean, palm trees dotting the banks and weird animals roaming the dense brush or haunting the breakers as they bore food from the great ocean.

Palm frond imprints twelve and more feet in length can be found in the rocks, fossil remains of the first horse, he that had three toes; animals too strange to recreate—it's a rich country for the student, and now they are trying to prove that it is a great filling station, for oil-drilling derricks begin to make their appearance on the horizon.

In any event here is country that was fecund with life even before the human race was evolved. Inside one round sea-worn boulder lay a perfect oyster and inside the oyster the remains of a pearl, crushed flat by the pressure. Along the slimy shores of this sea the life must have been a short one and crowded, for the country is honeycombed with evidence, all of a low life origin—clam shells a yard across, great snails, other shells shaped like nothing we see this day, marine oysters not well organized enough to go out for themselves, but doomed to rest on a still shore until petrified and then to prove their age to discoverers thousands of years later.

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

Cycol will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of Cycol as shown on the Cycol Recommendation Chart. Use Associated gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

CURRENT VERSE.

The Wet Streets.

It needs not noontide's ripe and generous ray
Nor sunset's smouldering glow,
To make this city street a luminous way.
Here through the rain's resplendencies I go
Enrapt, and watch the road's transfiguring
To a most mystic thing.
Vivid the windows flame,
And dazzling signs of merchandise or name
Break on the solid black;
Each lamp defines my track
With sportive checkwork of conflicting gleams,
Fantastic as dreams.
Wet wheels swish rapid and are gone,
Like glow-worms taking flight,
And, miracles of flashing light,
The clanging cars come on.

Far off, the rainstorms beat
On tangled sobbing grasses, sodden'd soil;
Here in the long loud street
They lash our human goings and our toil,
Casting their liberal diamonds at our feet.
Yonder on wood and down the torrent falls,
But here on blackened walls
And roofs, and mirrors of refulgent glass,
By which the people pass,
Each nursing his own dream, feeding his hope
Of wide or narrow scope.
And some behold the signs and marvels—some
See nothing, being blind;
Bringing no light, they have no light to find,
And famish'd pass as empty as they come.

—Arthur L. Salmon in the London Observer.

Songs of the Marches.

I.

It is the Fifth Month.
But still the Heaven-high hills
Shine with snow.
There are no flowers
For the heart of earth is yet too chilly.
From the centre of the camp
Comes the sound of a flute
Playing "The Snapped Willow."
No colour mists the trees,
Not yet have their leaves broken.
At dawn, there is the shock and shouting of battle,
Following the drums and the loud metal gongs.
At night, the soldiers sleep, clasping the pommels
Of their jade-ornamented saddles.
They sleep lightly,
With their two-edged swords girt below their loins,
So that they may be able in an instant to rush upon the Barbarians
And destroy them.

II.

Horses!
Horses!
Swift as the three dogs' wind!
Whips stinging the clear air like the sharp calling of birds,
They ride across the camel-back bridge
Over the river Wei.
They bend the bows,
Curving them away from the moon which shines behind them
Over their own country of Han.
They fasten feathers on their arrows
To destroy the immense arrogance of the foe.
Now the regiments are divided
And scattered like the five-pointed stars,
Sea mist envelops the deserted camp,
The task is accomplished,
And the portrait of Ho P'iao Yao
Hangs magnificently in the Lin Pavilion.

III.

When Autumn burns along the hills,
The Barbarian hordes mount their horses
And pour down from the North.
Then, in the country of Han,
The Heavenly soldiers arise
And depart from their homes.
The High General
Divides the tiger tally.
Fight, Soldiers!
Then lie down and rest
On the Dragon sand.
The frontier moon casts the shadows of bows upon the ground,
Swords brush the hoar-frost flowers of the Barbarians' country.
The Jade Pass has not yet been forced,
Our soldiers hold it strongly.
Therefore the young married women
May cease their lamentations.

IV.

The Heavenly soldiers are returning
From the sterile plains of the North.
Because the Barbarians desired their horses
To drink of the streams of the South,
Therefore were our spears held level to the charge
In a hundred fights.
In straight battle our soldiers fought
To gain the supreme gratitude
Of the Most High Emperor.
They seized the snow of the Inland Sea
And devoured it in their terrible hunger.
They lay on the sand at the top of the Dragon Mound
And slept.
All this they bore that the Moon Clan
Might be destroyed.
Now indeed they have won the right
To the soft, high bed of Peace.
It is their just portion.

An interesting war memorial is that for the town of Campton, New York. The work has been entrusted to F. Schuyler Mathews, a pupil of Walter Crane. Mr. Mathews has used the ancient art of illumination, taking his ornament entirely from the stained glass of Rheims and Soissons. His memorial is in the form of a triptych in a carved frame and will hang in the town hall at Campton.

Conserving the Wild Flowers.

The California Wild Flower Conservation League has started an educational campaign against the thoughtless destruction of wild flowers and shrubs. This is largely due to the fact that hordes of motorists and hikers are, through their carelessness, threatening almost complete extermination of many delicate wildings.

Through the efforts of the league, a bill was passed by the last California legislature for the protection of the toyon or Christmas berry, which had already been practically destroyed in many sections of the state. It is now proposed that a bill be brought before the next legislature for the protection of certain flowers that are rapidly diminishing in places where they formerly grew in abundance. To this end an educational campaign is being conducted through the schools and numerous organizations. A conference of nature lovers, scientists, and members of outdoor clubs that will be national in its scope will be held in connection with the eighth annual display of the wild flowers of California, which opens at the Hotel St. Francis on April 20th, continuing to the 22d; its object being to acquaint the public with the variety and charm of the native flowers and plants and their value as beautiful and important assets to the landscape. At the last exhibit, held in April, 1921, over seven thousand school children were in attendance. They were addressed by David Starr Jordan and Luther Burbank. The work is directed by Mrs. Bertha M. Rice, who is assisted by many scientists and educators.

The Japanese Woman Printer.

Writing of a certain Japanese newspaper office, Frances Little says in Harper's Magazine for February:

"Not only is it done for women, but by women. And one would have to go a long journey before he could find so cheerfully busy a group as that which I found in an office, neither spacious nor sumptuous, but just a place where work could be done, and no time lost in powdering noses or reddening lips.

"The girls gave me a cordial welcome. They were neither shy, embarrassed, nor bold. Simply women who, having been thrust out into the world, adapted themselves to conditions which their great-grandmothers would have committed hara-kiri before submitting to. The girls could smile, too, at the long hours, at their hard tasks, and at the curious stranger who was asking them all kinds of questions.

"I watched one of the girls prepare her material for the morrow's issue. Did she luxuriously lounge before a typewriter which was guaranteed to do everything but talk out loud, and click off page after page of neat type? Not so. With sleeve turned back, she dipped a little brush in India ink and, beginning at the top of a long strip of paper, she bent to her work of painting characters. Each character on that clean white page looked to me as hopelessly intricate as a mused-up puzzle, but every stroke told a story, and her slender fingers went at such a giddy speed it fairly made me cross-eyed to follow."

Golf for a Degree.

Imaginary examination papers are an old form of merry jesting at the English universities (says a writer in the New York Times). At Oxford something of a novelty has been produced in the form of questions put to candidates for a degree in "Golf, Its Theory and Practice." This course, it is explained, is not to be combined with that in agriculture or language. The hint is plain that no knowledge of farming operations on the links, or the accompanying exercises in profanity, will be required. But the classics and history are ransacked to find puzzlers for the aspiring Doctors of Golf.

Thus at the beginning the student is asked to consider the familiar recubans sub tegmine fagi, and to decide whether it would imply a good or bad "lie." Also, what club would Tityrus be advised to use in order to play out his ball from under the beech! The candidate is further called upon to discourse on the Thracian Triballi, and to show by historical evidence that it was golf, not pawn-broking, which gave origin to the name. A nice question would be whether that particular Thracian tribe permitted four-ball matches. So the examination gravely goes on from criticism of Caesar's play at the water-hazard of the Rubicon to "et ego in Arcadia. Where was this bunker?"

The whole is admirable and learned fooling. But it will not ruffle the dignity of the convinced golfer. He knew beforehand that his favorite game embraced all philosophy, all humor, all moral excellence. These Oxford wits have nothing to teach him.

Chao-Hsin-Chu, Chinese Chargé d'Affaires in Great Britain, recently commented on various languages before a British audience, pointing out that the speech and writing of his countrymen were exceedingly difficult, but not to the Chinese. He himself spoke in English, and concluded: "As I went to school in America, I learned your language second-hand."

A series of moving pictures telling the story of white pine from the forest through the mill will be shown February 3d, at 8 p. m., in Room 125, Hilgard Hall, University of California. These films will demonstrate the various operations down to the final finished product. The picture will also show white pine bluster rust, a disease which is now threatening this fine tree. The entertainment is under the auspices of the Forestry Club of the University of California College of Agriculture. The public is cordially invited to attend.

She (tenderly)—And are mine the only lips you have kissed? He—Yes, and they are the sweetest of all.—Columbia Jester.

"Isn't it hard in these days to live within your means?" "I don't know. My wife won't let me try it."—Seattle Post-Intelligencer.

Jazz—My girl told me she weighed 120 the other night. Beau—Stripped? Jazz—Yeh; she was in an evening gown.—Ohio Sun Dial.

"Lots of girls say they would rather dance than eat." "But they don't mean that. You gotta buy supper for 'em."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

"It was a case of love at first sight when I met Jack." "Then why didn't you marry him?" "I met him again so often."—Boston Transcript.

Interviewer—What sort of girls make the best showgirls? Stage Manager—Those who have the most to show, of course.—Dartmouth Jack O'Lantern.

Mother (reprovingly)—When I was young, girls never thought of doing the things they do today. Daughter—Well, that's why they didn't do them.—Pickup.

Papa—Why did you permit young Gaybird to kiss you in the parlor last night? Daughter—Because I was afraid he'd catch cold in the hall.—Boston Globe.

Chatty Person—Too bad you lost so much at bridge, my dear; but, anyway, it's nice you've been granted your alimony. "Yes; unlucky at cards, lucky at love!"—Judge.

"In time of trial," said the preacher, "what brings us the greatest comfort?" "An acquittal," responded a person who should never have been admitted.—Stanford Chaparral.

"Terribly rough," said the stranger on board the ocean liner. "Well," said the farmer, "it wouldn't be near so rough if the captain would only keep in the furrows."—Virginia Reel.

"Would you marry a man to reform him?" "What does he do?" "He drinks." "Marry him, girlie, and find out where he gets it. We need him badly in our set."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

"Shay, did you see me come in?" The other chap replied, "Yes, I saw you come in." "Well—hic!—ever see me before?" "No, I never saw you before." "Then—hic—how did you know it was me?"—Syracuse Orange Peel.

"Mary," said the mistress, "did you ask every one for cards today, as I told you, when they called?" "Yes'm. One fellow he wouldn't give me no card, but I swiped his hat an' shoved him off th' steps. Here's his name on th' sweat band."—Richmond Times-Dispatch.

"He proposed to me last night, mother. What shall I do?" "But, my dear daughter, you've only known him three weeks." "I know that, mother, but on the other hand if I delay in accepting him he might find out some things about me he won't like, too."—Indianapolis News.

"Thanks for this beer prescription, doctor. It will certainly save my life." "I hope so," said the physician, dryly. "And, by the way, I'm a little out of touch with the sources of supply. Do you know whether or not drug-gists are going to sell pretzels?"—Birmingham Age-Herald.

The senator was back home, looking after his political fences, and was asking the minister about some of his old acquaintances. "How's old Mr. Jones?" he inquired. "Will I be likely to see him today?" "You'll never see Mr. Jones again," said the minister. "Mr. Jones has gone to heaven."—Washington Star.

The newly-elected president of a banking institution was being introduced to the employees. He singled out one of the men in the cashier's cage, questioning him in detail about his work, etc. "I have been here forty years," said the cashier's assistant, with conscious pride, "and in all that time I only made one slight mistake." "Good," replied the president. "Let me congratulate you. But hereafter be more careful."—Wall Street Journal.

"Yes," said the old man to his visitor, "I am proud of my girls and would like to see them comfortably married, and as I have made a little money they will not go penniless to their husbands. There is Mary, twenty-five years old, and a really good girl. I shall give her $1000 when she marries. Then comes Bet, who won't see thirty-five again. I shall give her $3000, and the man who takes Eliza, who is forty, will have $5000 with her." The young man reflected a moment and then asked, "You haven't one about fifty, have you?"—Glasgow Herald.

American Ships Losing Ground.

The United States must exert itself if it is to hold its own in the shipping business (says the New York Times). The Commerce Department publishes figures for the first ten months of 1921 which indicate that our grip is slipping. After Canada, we do the largest volume of our foreign trade with Great Britain. American ships carried 21 per cent. to and from the Atlantic coast in January, increased this share to 55 per cent. in June, but let it fall to 15 per cent. in October. For the gulf coast the percentage in American ships was 12 in January, rose as high as 31 in July, but fell to 11 in October, and was 19 for the ten months. The greatest decrease is shown by the Pacific Coast, where our ships carried 53 per cent. in January, 74 per cent. in April, but suffered a decrease to 15 in October and show 33 per cent. for the ten months. . . .

The real fight of our merchant marine for business is on. Cost of operating foreign ships has been deflated and there is such a surplus of tonnage that they struggle for what business there is. Americans can offset the difference between American and foreign wages to a certain degree by superior efficiency, but there is no margin for obsolete shipping laws which needlessly add to expense. The American people may do much to maintain their own merchant marine, but they will not pay to preserve absurd obstacles which Congress can remove, or for wasteful, inefficient methods of shipping men. When a clear record can be shown in these respects, when competition among American ship-owners has done its best, they can go to Congress with hope that it will help to preserve their industry.

The sands in the River Eder have been found to be rich with gold, according to reports from Waldeck in Thuringia, and companies have been organized to exploit them. Gold has been known to be in the river sands for several years, but, until a recent drought which virtually dried up the stream, it was not realized that the deposits were rich enough to make their exploitation commercially profitable. Modern machinery is to be used and the promoters say they are certain they can recover millions of marks' worth of the yellow metal. The River Eder rises in Rhenish Prussia, forty-two miles northeast of Coblenz, and flows into the River Fulda near Cassel.

Science in the Museum.

In a civilization that is always changing, always replacing and renewing, there is a little that keeps stationary (says a writer in the Manchester Guardian). We try through our museums to keep a hold on the vanishing past and to snatch some few things from oblivion. But even in the museums the common process of decay goes on, though the public knows little of it. Turners lose the glories of their color and have to be jealously hidden behind shutters. Chemical changes and microscopic agents of decay, like bacteria, molds, and lichens, have to be reckoned with. Pictures, engravings, fabrics become spotted and disfigured, and bright tints are dulled. The surfaces of stone monuments flake off; colored enamels break away from their metal bases. An object made of a silver alloy may turn into an unrecognizable mass because the metal has changed into its chloride. Sometimes a mysterious epidemic may arise in a museum. The seals and other lead objects in one case may turn into a white powder, while another case in the same room may be immune. Unless the museums can bring science to their aid, there is small chance of our passing on the complete records of history that we should like. It is good to know that something is being done by that valuable and insufficiently supported government institution, the Department of Scientific and Industrial Research, which has just issued, through the Stationery Office, a first account of recent researches into methods of cleaning and restoring exhibits at the British Museum. Dr. Alexander Scott, the distinguished chemist detailed for the work, here relates how, by perfectly safe means, the "foxiness" or mildewing of prints and drawings can be removed and the blackened whites of old colored drawings restored. He has also made important investigations into the effect of age on metals, and has brought back ancient silver vessels, corroded and almost rotten, to something like their old brilliancy. His researches show that we are only at the beginning of this branch of applied chemical science. The new methods of treatment may be of great use in salving the finds of archaeological excavation, so often ruined by the effects of a few thousand years' burial.

There has always been something melancholy in the thought of how much of the beauty of the "rich proud cost of outworn buried age" has been lost to us through the defacements of decay.

The origin of the modern newspaper is traced to the Acta Diurna of ancient Rome. It was an official gazette issued under the management and authority of the government, and posted daily in some prominent part of the city.

The Franks began the year on March 1st. In the reign of Charlemagne New Year's Day was shifted to Christmas Day and continued so till the sixteenth century.

Politics and the Bonus.

A conservative estimate places the cost of the bonus at $2,500,000,000—two thousand, five hundred millions. The money must come from somewhere, but nobody has yet been able to say precisely how it is to be raised. Suggestions are various, but nobody has come forward with convincing argument in favor of any plan. The notion that our foreign debtors may provide it is chimerical, for assuredly there can be no dependence upon countries frankly unable to pay either principal or interest. Secretary Mellon, a careful man of business, declares that the money can be provided only by a scheme of taxation so distributed as to reach everybody who sends a letter or newspaper through the post, who uses imported articles, who rides on a railroad train or an automobile, or who buys any article of home manufacture. Taxes so adjusted would search both wide and deep. Their imposition would reach every hearthside. All this is proposed, not upon any tenable theory of equity, not in support of any obligation, but to the end of winning the "soldier vote." One party, beyond a doubt, is as ready as another to yield this vicious sop. But at the moment the Republican party is in control of the government. It seeks to remain in control. But its authorities are fearful that if the bribe of the bonus shall not be given, the soldier vote will turn to the opposition.

The Argonaut is a Republican. But its Republicanism is that of principle. As a Republican it protests against action on the part of the Republican party that would employ the financial resources of the government to bribe voters. Furthermore, it believes that the means proposed will not attain the end in view. The man whose vote is purchased has no conscience about cheating the purchaser. The voter who is bought not always stays bought. Having taken his fee he is more than likely to vote against the giver as a means of illustrating his "independence."

But the receiver of the bonus is but one element in the situation. There is to be considered the man who supplies the money. What of the taxpayer? Are those—and this means everybody—who must put a three-cent stamp on a letter in the place of a two-cent stamp likely to regard the charge with favor? Is the man or the woman who finds the cost of living higher all around because the bonus must be paid, likely to take kindly to the arrangement? A profound political philosopher once declared in a phrase not likely ever to be forgotten that no way had ever been found to tax and to please. Those who are planning this debacle of the public treasury would do well to remember that, not only the soldier, but the taxpayer is to be considered.

All this is quite aside from the moral aspects of the case. Here, indeed, in broad view is the most serious feature of the matter. The soldier who returned unharmed from France, hardier in body and richer in mind for the experience, has no moral claim upon the government. Assuredly the man whose soldiering consisted in an experience of travel and of military training, and whose life has been immeasurably enriched thereby, has no claim. The man to whom government bounty is due is the man who returned from the war disabled or disqualified for the business of life. At this point it is due that the government should be generous even to the point of lavishness, but here is the limit of obligation. To go further—literally to buy the soldier vote—would tend, not to benefit, but to demoralization. Verily it is a bad business—bad for the government, bad for the finances of the country, bad for the soldier, ultimately bad for the political party that seeks to cajole the soldier vote by paying for it with funds wrung from the citizenship of the country.

Work of the Conference.

With the work of the Conference complete and in plain view it is a simple task to outline its concrete results. It has worked out a practical reduction of naval armaments along the lines originally suggested by the American delegation. It has curbed the imperialistic ambition of Japan, and in so doing has safe-guarded China against a systematic aggression that was in the way of reducing that great country to a state of vassalage. It has adjusted—though not very satisfactorily from the American point of view—conditions in the Pacific Ocean that threatened to disturb harmonious relations between the United States and Japan. It has nullified a long-standing contract between Britain and Japan, an engagement that had promoted many mischiefs. It has—though France is slow to recognize the fact—created a situation calculated to safeguard France against German resentment and aggression.

These are truly great achievements, sufficient in themselves to justify the Conference many times over. But they are less important than the moral effects of the Conference. A new fashion has been set in international dealing. A method has been devised under which the judgment of civilized mankind may be brought to bear upon questions of international conduct. A notable moral enlargement has been made to the scope of international law and a new sanction given to its authority. In respect of what has been done at Washington any nation that would seek to put upon another impositions like those proposed in Japan's "Twenty-One Demands" on China would make of itself an outlaw; and any nation that would proceed by violence against another without previous reference of matters at issue to diplomatic consideration would lose respect among civilized people. Nothing so tending to the betterment of world diplomacy—so tending to harmonize differences between nations—has ever before been achieved.

An incidental effect of the Conference is its development of coöperative spirit on the part of the English-speaking nations. In this fact alone there abides a guaranty of continued moral leadership of the world under the standards of English civilization. This is a thing of tremendous value. It means nothing less than dominance in the larger affairs of the world of peoples committed sentimentally, traditionally, and historically to good faith, to standards of national honor, to respect for the Christian virtues.

It is to be regretted that Germany and Russia have had no part in the Conference. In either case the reasons were, at the time the Conference was called, sufficient. As regards Germany, conditions have changed and in the future development of international dealing she will, of course, have full part and share. How long it may be until Russia shall find ways of reorganization only time can tell. Both these great potential countries must be brought into coöperation before the system of international dealing inaugurated at Washington shall become an all-powerful force in the world.

The immediate question in this country relates to the attitude of the United States Senate toward the findings of the Conference. The concrete results—scarcely less the moral effects—of the Conference can have no legal and binding force so far as the United States is concerned until the Senate shall have recorded its judgment. There is, we think, little doubt that confirmation will be both prompt and emphatic. There are, to be sure, those in whom the habit of opposition is so fixed that they can yield assent to nothing that does not match certain narrow conceptions. Voices will be raised against the treaties upon notions founded in limited views, in timidity, in political calculation. But there is little doubt that the Senate will yield its assent to commitments that have already won the approval of the country at large.

Pope Pius XI.

It seems likely that Pope Pius XI will throw a larger shadow on the stage of world affairs than either of his two predecessors. If anything can be inferred from the few indications of his character thus far available, it is that he has been chosen for what might be called, without sinister suggestion, his aggressive qualities, and there is a general feeling that the choice will have large consequences. This does not imply that Pius X and Benedict XV were of negligible stature. On the contrary, each of them seems to have discharged the rôle which the necessities of his time required of him. The augmented prestige of the papal throne owes much to Pius X, whose simplicity and kindliness won a tribute of respect and even of affection from people of very different creeds at a time when religious animosity ran much higher than at present. Benedict XV carried the sceptre of the church through a period of upheaval when a false step might have meant disaster, but throughout the ordeal held steadfastly for peace and humanity, and in his difficult task of mediation showed the vision of a statesman—or at least the wisdom to adopt Cardinal Gasparri's. All this was done so quietly that it needed his death to make the extent of his accomplishment apparent. But in the constructive period that is now beginning the church evidently requires a more audible voice, a more active executive, and a more assertive man of affairs. The new deference of the Quirinal to the Vatican, the renewed attentions of the French government, the abandonment of old rights of veto by lay governments in the papal election, and the intriguingly non-committal attitude of the political leaders of Ireland toward the election, are all portents of an enlarged political rôle for the new Pope. Whether or not this will ultimately prove of advantage or otherwise to his prestige remains to be proved—but he has doubtless been chosen with all this in mind.

Archbishop Ratti of Milan received his cardinal's hat for political services of a delicate nature in Poland. He is a large man, in mind and body, and the rapidity of his rise to power betokens uncommon energy as well as intellectual finesse. Saintliness is not mentioned among his outstanding qualifications for the office. His political tendencies are liberal, but less so than those of the "conciliation" candidate, Archbishop Maffi of Pisa, who is supposed to be the king's ecclesiastical adviser, and who would probably have been chosen in preference had Italian affairs been the important object of solicitude just now. For good or ill, the convening cardinals appear to have set up a ruler of large aspirations, who will prove in no idle sense of the term a world figure.

The continued stability of the papal monarchy through years of change and revolution that have dealt harshly with so many other kings, depends on several factors, but not least on its happy combination of arbitrary with representative rule. Unlike hereditary dynasties, the papal succession is enriched by the accession of remarkable men of all classes. This has kept it in vital and sympathetic contact with Catholic society at large. The faith and patience of the Pope's subjects have never been tried by a visitation of successive royal tormentors, such as, for example, the Stuart house in England. The death of an unjust ruler has generally made room for a better one, and in each new appointment the lessons derived from the preceding one have been utilized by the electors, as in a republic. At the same time one great weakness of the republican system has been avoided. Each Pope has had time and free opportunity to develop his policy, without being forced to bargain in order to remain in office, or to waste in party disputes energy that should be employed in the wider arena of statecraft. He is selected to fit the exigencies of his time, and usually does so. If he proves great, it is as a result of design rather than accident. He takes rank with emperor and president alike, enjoying the rare privilege, in Kipling's words, to walk with kings, nor lose the common touch. In fact the most vital quality of the papacy might be said to be that it is "catholic."

California and the Treaties.

Recently upon his return to Washington, after several weeks at home, Senator Johnson made a public statement to the effect that sentiment in California was against the Four-Power Pact. It would be interesting to know the source of the senator's information. Nobody else has discovered anything like general objection to the treaty. On the other hand, there are evidences of practical unanimity of opinion favorable to the pact. The Argonaut has been at some pains to sound the public mind, and the result of its inquiries tends to discredit the senator's statement.

We have heard but one argument, and that from a single source—a source, it is fair to say, of high intelligence—in protest against the Four-Power arrangement. It goes to this effect: America and Britain, under their standards of honor, may be depended upon to keep faith. Whatever pledges they may give will be honored both in letter and in spirit. Under the Four-Power Pact they will disarm to the extent of destroying a considerable part of their navies and of refraining from arrangements tending to their augmentation. On the other hand, argues the objector—we do not quote his precise phrases—Germany (which must ultimately be brought into the arrangement) and Japan are nations of dubious repute. The one stands on record as holding a solemn treaty to be merely "a scrap of paper," the other notoriously has tricky habits of dealing internationally; nobody really trusts her. What is to hinder Germany or Japan, after entering into pledges of peace, from secretly preparing for war? Both have done it before; both have sought by fierce and sudden onslaught to overwhelm unprepared enemies.

From the critical source above quoted came another argument in objection to the Four-Power Pact or of any other arrangement tending to limit defensive preparation on the part of the United States. The argument runs as follows: The spirit that makes for war between nations has not been exorcised, and may not be, by the Washington Conference or any other. As there have been wars in the past so there will be wars in the future. Future wars will be waged in the air, and there will be, in resources of chemistry not yet exploited but known to experts, means of wrecking, not only cities, but wide areas of country. Today a fleet of airships provided with "Lewisite" could wipe out any city as by a whirlwind. America and Britain, under pledge not to make defensive preparations, will be at the mercy of any nation that holds its pledges to be merely "scraps of paper." There is but one way to meet the possibilities of war, in whatever form it may take, and that is to match preparation with preparation.

There is interest in these pessimistic speculations. But if we are to take them seriously, in their full logical effect, then we must assume that national good faith is a mere idealism upon which no country may depend. We must yield to the hard theory that civilization is a failure. There can be no moral progress in the relationship of nations if diplomacy is to be based upon the theory that there is no such thing as national honor.

Faith breeds faith; and the rule applies to nations as to men. Bismarck, the wisest statesman of his day, made prophecy that in future international conflicts the "imponderables" would count for more than actualities. What he meant was that moral forces would be more effective than physical forces. His own country has now learned at tremendous cost the lesson that Bismarck sought to teach; and the whole world has shared in the lesson. The authority of moral as distinct from physical force has been illustrated in the Conference at Washington. Settlements have been reached upon the basis of faith in national commitments. Admitted that some risk may be involved in the doctrine of faith in international dealing, there still remains the fact that faith is the only resource if there is to be moral progress in the world.

If, as our critic points out, there are now available resources of offense of an overwhelming horribleness, then surely it is a time when the common sense of mankind must find a way to adjust differences between nations by some means other than wholesale destruction of cities and peoples, and there can be no progress in any movement to this end unless confidence shall be placed in the good faith of nations.

Senator Johnson, we believe, has misjudged the sentiment and the will of the people of California. Here, as elsewhere, there are a few whose lack of confidence in the integrity of nations other than our own leads them to protest against the Four-Power Pact. But the greater number of Californians applaud the effort that has been made, and have faith in what has been accomplished toward substituting understanding and the spirit of confidence for warships, cannon, and machine guns. Unless we misappraise the public mind, California would vote five to one to confirm the Four-Power Pact—and the general achievements of the Conference.

What Has Been Done.

Following is a detailed summary of the concrete accomplishments of the Washington Conference:

Completion of a treaty by the United States, Great Britain, France, Japan, and Italy limiting the size of their navies.

Completion of a treaty forbidding the use of poison gas in warfare, and making it illegal in the eyes of international law for a submarine to attack and sink a merchant ship.

A tri-party agreement by the United States, Great Britain, and Japan providing for the maintenance of the status quo in Pacific.

Complete settlement of the controversy between China and Japan over Kaio-chou in the Province of Shantung, under which Japan is to surrender the former German leasehold and China is to regain complete control of the territory and of the Shantung railroad.

Announcement by Great Britain that she would return the port of Wei Hai Wei to China.

An agreement to adhere to the "open door" policy in China.

The adoption of a Four-Power compact in terms pledging the powers to respect each other's territory in the Pacific and calling for a conference of nations when the peace of the Pacific region is threatened. This compact will abrogate the Anglo-Japanese alliance, when ratified.

A settlement made outside of, but in view of the Conference, of the dispute between Japan and the United States over the Island of Yap.

A formal pledge from Japan to withdraw from Siberia and from the northern portion of the Island of Sakhalin.

Abrogation of the "twenty-one demands" through adoption of the "open door" pledge relative to China and the settlement of the Shantung question.

Editorial Notes.

Governor Stephens' letter to the railroad commissioners advising them in effect to press down a bit harder on certain corporations will hardly add to his repute for dignity or propriety. It is the business of the governor to appoint the railroad commission. It is the business of the railroad commission to fix rates and conditions of service. It is at all times the business of all men, in or out of office, to mind their own business. The governor is no more justified in reason or propriety in prompting the railroad commission than any other citizen. In doing so he exhibits himself in the character of a politician employing his prestige as an official illegitimately to promote his candidacy for reelection.

A bill has been introduced in the Kentucky legislature to prohibit by heavy penalty the teaching of evolution, or the use of books favoring evolution, in schools supported by public funds. President McVey of the University of Kentucky has given to the newspapers a letter from President Butler of Columbia University commenting on this proposed legislation, as follows:

NEW YORK, January 27, 1922.

MY DEAR PRESIDENT McVEY: This proposal is, I take it, the result of the reaction of some enthusiastic admirer of the eloquent addresses that have recently been given on the subject of evolution by my good friend, Mr. William Jennings Bryan.

The bill, as you describe it, seems to me to lack vigor and completeness. It should, I think, be amended before passage to include in its prohibition the use of any book in which the word evolution is defined, used, or referred to in any way. It might even be desirable to include a prohibition of books that use any of the letters by which the word evolution could be spelled, since in this way some unscrupulous person might by ingenious effort evade the salutary provisions of the law.

I take it for granted that the introducer of the bill is in close communion with the rulers of Soviet Russia, since he is faithfully reproducing one of their fundamental policies. Truly we are getting on.

Faithfully yours,
NICHOLAS MURRAY BUTLER.

The appointment of Senator Kenyon of Iowa to the judgeship of the Eighth United States Judicial District is abundantly justified by his eminent qualifications. There may, however, have been another motive in the mind of the President. In the Senate Kenyon has been the head and front of the agricultural bloc. The bloc has been very much of an obstacle in the way of President Harding. It is just possible that Mr. Harding had this fact in mind when he moved Senator Kenyon out from the Senate and into the Federal judiciary.

The "movies" are hard hit. First, there were the revolting revelations of the Arbuckle case. Now comes the murder of Taylor at Hollywood, with its incidental exposition of the free-and-easy ways of the "movie" world. Out of these tragedies good may come in the form of moral regeneration. The American public does many queer things, but it does not permanently give favor and support to institutions that do not maintain a fairly decent front, likewise a fairly decent background. Following the developments of the Arbuckle case popular patronage of the film shows fell off sharply; and now another decline is in sight as an effect of the Hollywood tragedy and its attendant scandals. If the "movie" world is to regain popular favor—if it is to maintain aforesaid standards of patronage—it must clean house. The American public will not tolerate an institution that flouts accepted moral standards and that riotously flaunts its derelictions in the face of the world.

The Soldier Bonus.

(New York Herald, February 1st.)

The American government can not well go too far in caring for our disabled soldiers, the sick, the crippled, and the incapacitated. The heart of America goes out to all these and demands succor and the most humane solicitude and care for them.

But a horizontal bonus to all soldiers, sick or well, rich or poor, is wholly another matter. It can not be justified because it is not sound, can not be justified because it is not right. It not only would put a tax on the already overtaxed people of the country, but worse would rob our soldiers of the spirit of patriotism the American people now see in them.

The price of citizenship to the young man is the protection of his country. Soldiering is his job. It is not the job of his mother, his father, or his sister. Soldiering is the job of the young man, and in this capacity he has played for the patriotism that is his birthright and that justifies his citizenship.

Accepting a bonus for doing his duty, for paying the price of citizenship to his country through service for his country, becomes him as poorly as it would become the man of dignity, with an appreciation of the fitness of things, to accept a tip tossed to him.

Already the country is coming to realize what a horizontal bonus would mean to the dignity and patriotism of its soldiers. Already the country is coming to realize what a calamity it would be for the government, staggering as it is under a war indebtedness of twenty-four billions of dollars, including our loans abroad, to be forced to make a bonus payment of five billions of dollars.

Already the country is stunned at the realization of the colossal measure of its obligations, its specific obligations to disabled soldiers, now reaching an outgo of four hundred and fifty millions dollars a year; its obligations in the way of a century of soldier pensions and with the untold years of interest ahead of us on our aggregate debt, in the reduction of which we are scarcely making a dent.

Secretary Mellon has got to find six and one-half billions of dollars to meet maturing obligations within the next sixteen months. This is for Victory Loan Bonds, for War Saving Certificates, and short-term notes. If the present holders of these government obligations are willing to take new issues to replace those maturing, the government can mount this formidable hurdle with little disturbance; if the present holders refuse to do this where will the government get the cash?

But if in addition Secretary Mellon is called upon suddenly to dig up enormous bonus payments, what then? If the bonus bill goes through and it fixes a burden on the country of, say, five billion dollars more, this five billion dollars more will mount to twenty-five billion dollars with interest before the last cent of it is paid off. It is either this or squeeze it out of the people in additional taxes.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

FRANCE.

Her View of the Situation Set Forth by an American Sympathizer.

ANGELS CAMP, CAL., February 5, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: The article entitled "France" in your issue of January 14th surprised many of your readers. To pretend that the German menace is a bogey is simply an assertion, not an absolute proof. A great deal of war material has been destroyed, but the commissions of control in Germany have, on the other hand, found, and are finding, concealed war material. War veterans are numerous and could be called together in a short time. The Germans themselves do not hide their firm intention of renewing their attack upon France as soon as a favorable opportunity arises, they are unrepentant and fully determined to evade all of their obligations if possible.

With the surrender of the German fleet England and the United States were made secure against the possibility of another attack. The Channel and the Atlantic cover our land frontiers.

France is face to face with the foe. France remembers that it is difficult to disarm a nation that has the will to war. Napoleon I tried it after Jena in 1806, and although in absolute possession of the country he failed. Therefore France refuses to take any chances, and no fair-minded person can blame her.

Her sacrifices during the war have been greater than those of any other nation. Her dead number 1,400,000, many more of her young men have been crippled for life, fully 60 per cent. of her industries have been totally wrecked with malice aforethought by the Germans.

During the war the general opinion among the allied and associated nations was that a peace of justice should follow the war. The country guilty of having brought about the conflict, perpetrated countless crimes against civilization, and disregarded the most solemn pledges and treaties was to be punished and held up as an example to whoever in the future would be tempted to disrupt the peace of the world. These thoughts were summed up in three words: Restitution—Reparation—Guaranties. Let us see how these ideas have been followed.

Restitution—Alsace-Lorraine was returned to France; but many things still remain to be restituted, for instance a large amount of stolen cattle and countless objects taken from private residences, works of art, etc., have never been found so far. Restitution is consequently incomplete, since some of the loot is still in possession of the thieves.

Reparation—No unprejudiced person can say that the Germans have made good on that score. If they have come through at all it is simply because France has been prepared to enforce the terms of the treaty and has prevented it from becoming another scrap of paper. The greater part of the cash payments, so far, have been divided between Belgium, and to that no one objects, and Great Britain.

In spite of the assurances of Mr. Lloyd George during the political campaign that followed the armistice and preceded the peace conference, not only did he not hang the Kaiser, but the other war criminals are still at large. What is strange, however, is that ever since he has invariably sided with the Germans and has exacted from France, at the expense of the French people, concessions upon concessions. The British government seems intent upon the task of putting Germany on her feet without thinking that, in all justice, France should be helped first.

The economic side of the question, the sober afterthought of shillings and pence, had swept away the more idealistic thought of justice, and France has been made to feel that when the immediate question of right stood in opposition to that of material gain the British government would not hesitate to sacrifice ideals to material advantages. French statesmen have been continually faced by the opposition of Mr. Lloyd George to their most just demands. "Even lately in the case of the Wiesbaden accord the English have raised objections and reserves when they should have welcomed the agreement cordially as the first dependable guarantee of help for a friendly and allied nation" (Literary Digest of January 14—"Calamitous Reparation Blunders of the Allies").

Guaranties—When it comes to that, we find that nothing has been done. Mr. Stephen Lauzanee states that recently, on board the S. S. Paris, Marshal Foch said to Mr. Viviani that if France had been allowed to permanently occupy the left bank of the Rhine he could have held it with six divisions; then, he added, we could have disarmed. When France asked for that guarantee both President Wilson and Mr. Lloyd George vetoed the proposition.

They forced France to abandon something tangible and substituted instead the Anglo-American treaty pledging immediate assistance to France in case she sustained another attack. France consented to this "chiefly out of regard for the United States." You know what became of this. It is to be feared that the judgment of posterity will not be in our favor. France found herself sitting on the floor between two chairs—with an open frontier, and instead of a solid pledge of immediate assistance a rather indefinite assurance that perhaps, after deliberate and mature consideration, she possibly would be helped out in case of need. What would happen to her while we were thus deliberating we dismiss from our minds.

France, therefore, feels abandoned. She is left alone to face the German menace, which to her is no bogey, and since she is running the risk, she ought to have a right to her opinion. She must alone enforce the terms of the treaty if she is to endure economically, and that in face of constant British opposition.

It is not generous on our part to accuse her of militarism and imperialism when she is merely taking measures to protect herself and recover part of her damages, when we have flatly refused to help her in any way and have, time and again, expressed our determination to exact from her integral payment of her debt to us; forgetting that she borrowed and spent that money while, to a certain extent, fighting for us as well as for herself. The least we could do would be to keep silent.

Because she arrives at an understanding with the government of Angola and withdraws from Cilicia she is accused of flirting with the Turks again for purposes of imperialism. Had she remained at war with Kemal she would likewise have been accused of the same crime. No matter what she does she gets the blame. It is a case of "you are damned if you do and damned if you don't."

The sole aim of the policy of France since the signing of the treaty at Versailles has been to enforce its provisions, get paid for part of what she has lost, and be prepared to ward off a possible attack of Germany. To please the United States and Great Britain she is asked to throw open her territory, exposing it to fresh devastation. Almost an invitation to commit suicide. She is asked to abandon all hope of ever getting compensation for only part of the damage she has sustained, being reminded at the same time that she will not overlook what she owes us.

Our respect for German honesty is such, however, that we would refuse to take Germany's debt to France as payment for France's debt to us.

She must also refrain from endeavoring to find among the new nations of Eastern Europe some support, since we are unwilling to commit ourselves one way or the other.

In other words, she must do our bidding regardless of consequences. No self-respecting nation would ever do that. We are asking too much and are unfair. If we think that the German menace is such a bogey, why don't we ratify the Anglo-American treaty, pledge ourselves to come to the immediate assistance of France in case of an attack. Since the German menace is a bogey, we would run no risks. France would disarm at once. Our country has but to say the word.

Yours truly, D. FRICOT.

This Man Doesn't Want to Cash in His Patriotism.

SANTA BARBARA, February 4, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: In sending in my check for another year's subscription to the Argonaut allow me to congratulate you on your stand regarding the bonus. As one who served for two years in the army of the United States during the late war I can speak at least without being charged with speaking in my own interest when I say that I, together with numerous other ex-service men, am disappointed to an unmeasurable degree in the stand that the American Legion has taken in the matter. During the time I was in the service I did not once hear mention made of a national bonus, and I was with a regiment that formed a part of the army of occupation in Germany, where there was plenty of time to think and talk. I am convinced that if some one had not thought of a bonus for them a majority, or at least a very substantial minority, of the men would not have thought of it for themselves.

EDWARD B. STARBUCK.

From an Advocate of the Bonus.

OAKLAND, January 26, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: An article appears in your January 14th issue of the Argonaut to which I take particular exception. That article deals with the adjusted compensation bill for veterans of the world war now pending in Washington.

Why does your criticism centre solely around the cash provision and ignore the four other forms of compensation which are included in the bill? It is unfair to try to pass judgment on them individually, when they are so closely related to one another.

Nobody knows how many will choose the cash bonus in preference to one of the other provisions. There have been lots of guesses by statisticians and "others" as to the amount of money required for this cash bonus, but, as there is no precedence to work on they can only guess. In my opinion the other four provisions in the bill—namely, paid-up endowment policy, vocational training, farm or home purchase, and land settlement—will come in for their share.

Your article says that this bill is to be "put through" and I agree with you on that point. But is it being "put through" any different than a lot of other bills which I and also you might name. Probably this compensation bill will remain on the shelf indefinitely if it were not for the fact that there is to be an advantage gained by those at Washington, and there is one, as you have said—the November election.

As has been repeatedly said, and lately by the President, there is no doubt in the minds of our representatives at Washington and others as to the justice of this adjusted compensation, or of the obligation on the part of the government to do something toward this end; but the stumbling block of the whole thing has been the question of raising the necessary funds. Nevertheless these representatives throughout the past three years of inaction have realized the obligation, but were at a loss as to the ways and means. Therefore the coming election is doing nothing more than forcing their hands. They are merely playing the old familiar game of politics, only in this case there is justification in the act and both sides will gain.

You say that it is iniquitous to take money from some people and bestow it on others? How do you suppose this old world runs? Are not people taking money from some one else and giving it to others every day in the year—usually for value received? And if a man is willing to leave his home, family, and position, and drop all personal ambitions and activities to shoulder a rifle and fight for his country, it appears as if that should be of some value, material as well as moral. It is also true, and rightfully, that a man should do all this, as every man is imbued with patriotism for his country, and would be a poor citizen if he were not; but when one is reminded of the glory and honor bestowed it reminds me of the doughboy who said, "You can't eat that."

A great many people seem to be forgetting the distinction between a man of the regular army and the one who drops his tools to go to the aid of his country in war-time. It is a regular army man's business to fight, and when the fight is over he resumes what he was doing before without losing anything of intrinsic value; on the contrary he gains in fighting experience, which is his regular business. But what of the office man and the factory hand? Can he pick up his pencil or his tools and begin where he left off after spending two or more years in the army? You have said "yes," that he is "richer in experience," which is true, but that isn't half the story, and it doesn't take anybody with superior brain knowledge to realize it.

Another thing. You say that the taxpayers will have to dig up again. Maybe so. But who are the taxpayers anyway? Are not the fathers, mothers, and relatives of the war veterans themselves the taxpayers? Don't these parents and relatives of those 3,000,000 men comprise nearly the entire population of the country? Do you think that these people are against this bill, which will aid their own sons, nephews, etc.? Do you believe that they would even think of depriving these poor devils lying in the hospitals of anything that would help them in any way or cheer them up? No, never, and that is the reason that something should have been done long ago, because the thousands of ex-soldiers that are dying every year will receive no benefit from this tardy legislation. In their cases the only one that gains is the government.

You attack the morale and self-dependence of the Americans by saying that if they accept this gratuity they will lose something of their self-respect. I differ with you on that point. It will undoubtedly be true of some, but you will find that the majority of these men who accept this money will use it to a good advantage, and every one, directly or indirectly, will benefit by it.

Your prediction of the ultimate downfall and deterioration of the government and the degeneration of the present generation through the channels of adjusted compensation is rather hard to believe. "However deep the hole, we can probably muster up enough strength to pull ourselves out."

In final refutation of your article I can point to the goodly number of states that have already provided some form of compensation for their veterans, and so far, at least, I have seen no signs of moral degeneration or political calamity overcoming their population.

Yours very truly,

IRVING E. PERRIN.

Another Protest.

Mr. B. M. Coffman of 461 Market Street, San Francisco, who entered the volunteer service as a private and later became an officer, has addressed the following letter to Senators Johnson and Shorridge and to Representative Kahn:

SAN FRANCISCO, February 7, 1922.

If Congress passes the so-called "Adjusted Compensation" bill at the behest of the American Legion it should be warned now that the Philippine veterans, and no doubt the Spanish-American war veterans, will demand similar treatment.

As a veteran of these little affairs I want absolutely nothing of the government. I went into the army then merely from patriotic motives, and no monetary consideration could or would ever pay me for the long vigils, hard marches, and whistling bullets in these petty campaigns. There are no degrees in death or suffering—all soldiers face the same conditions while on active service, be it in France or the Philippines.

I claim, therefore, that when such a dastardly attempt is made to commercialize patriotism, it should at least be consistent and include all living soldiers of all wars.

Let me make myself perfectly plain once more on this subject: I object to the proposed bonus on the ground that it is utterly absurd to attempt through dollars and cents to pay for what is the highest and noblest duty its citizen soldiers may give the republic. Indeed I would say that every able-bodied man owes this service to his country as a part payment of the benefits derived from citizenship.

Again, I would denounce the whole scheme as a "hold-up" pure and simple. To embody such a principle in our scheme of government would mean that our returning armies are as much to be feared as the invasion of an enemy; therefore the plan is immoral in the extreme.

Another point in the plan, which I feel is reprehensible from any point of view, is the inference that those of us who were deprived of the privilege of military service failed in our duty to those who did the actual fighting. This assumption is false in every particular, since never did the spirit of sacrifice so thoroughly pervade the nation as during the great war. Take the Liberty Bond issues as an example—hardly a family but strained itself to the uttermost to buy these securities, with resulting losses many have been ill able to bear. Now comes these rapacious gentry with proposals which threaten the values yet remaining in these obligations.

Except from the standpoint of pure selfishness, the American Legion has not a leg to stand on.

In conclusion I would state that my opposition to this measure is entirely a matter of principle, since I long ago disposed of my bonds, incidentally at a sharp loss.

I trust you may see your way clear to aid in defeating this pernicious measure, the iniquity of which is daily becoming more and more apparent to the people.

With great respect, I am,

Very truly yours,

B. M. COFFMAN.

DISARMAMENT AND THE NEAR EAST.

Herbert Spencer is famous for having said, among other things, that all progress is a development from simplicity to complexity. From a human and purposive viewpoint (with which Mr. Spencer had very little concern) this formula is not very satisfactory. His own works commended themselves to highly civilized people all over the world, not because they added greatly to the complex aggregate of human knowledge, but because they simplified it. In as far as he represented a progress over earlier natural philosophers, it was because he united and correlated their discoveries. This paradox is characteristic of the whole progress of human thought. The more we learn, the more we appreciate simplicity. Only a primitive mind enjoys being complex; the mature intelligence demands consistency and coherence. In fact, the advance of civilization might be called a reach toward simpler ways of doing difficult things. And the two dangers that beset this advance on either side are the danger of oversimplification, consisting in the reduction of life to a dogma or arbitrary law, and that of excessive diversity, or what we call anarchy.

Not the least of the obstacles to American acceptance of the league of nations idea has been its threat to complicate rather than simplify the relations of the nations to each other—the threat, in other words, to reverse the process of standardization on which our conception of progress is so largely based. And, in its operation thus far, it has given rise to many complexities. Perhaps the most perplexing of them all is the question as to where the rights of small nations begin and where they leave off, and as to what distinguishes the principle of self-determination from mere disruption. The old, strong-handed doctrine had at least the advantage of being perspicuous and definite. The power of the conquerors was a tangible standard by which the pretensions of smaller states could be measured. But ever since Mr. Wilson presented the subject nations with that delusively simple charter of sovereignty the boundaries of their ambition seem to have gone fluid. Those who regard the fourteen points as having opened a Pandora box of anarchy and confusion on the world have a good deal of evidence in their favor, and are no doubt deriving considerable satisfaction from the recent disturbances in the Orient and Near East.

It is certain that much of the present trouble in Egypt, Asia Minor, and India can be attributed to the Wilsonian idea. Without the encouragement it extended to all the subject races, Mustapha Kemal in Turkey and Zanghloul in Egypt, to say nothing of Ghandi, would assuredly have kept their demands within more reasonable limits. The Egyptian situation may be taken as a type of the whole trouble in the Near East. Without the stimulus of the American precepts of independent nationalism there would probably have been no demand last year for the abandonment by the British of the Soudan and the head waters of the Nile, so painfully reconquered and recomposed by Lord Kitchener, or for the elimination of British control in Egyptian foreign affairs, or for British evacuation of the Suez Canal. Irresponsible interpreters of Wilson's idea—advocates of disarmament and a general disintegration of the order maintained by force—are even now urging the insurgents to more extravagant demands, in defiance of government that rests in any degree on the sanction of arms.

The ideas inspiring such propaganda are short-sighted and confused. Only the blindest kind of sentimentalism can evade the fact that some kind of force must be maintained in Egypt and the other Eastern territories if we are to escape the evils of tribal war or the horrors of a Moslem crusade. The security of the white race demands it, as does also the common right of free commerce and travel in that section of the world. American merchants have as large an interest as any in maintaining the Eastern channels of trade intact, nor can the American people in general view the issue with equanimous unconcern. These rights and securities, as regards Egypt and India at least, have hitherto been guaranteed the world by Great Britain. The arrangement has been profitable to her, but necessary and profitable to the rest of the world also, and it is only fair to admit that under such administrators as Lord Milner she has granted these territories the maximum of self-government consistent with order. There is no such thing in the world as absolute freedom or absolute self-government, nor is every people to be trusted even with a large degree of either. If we are to encourage the overthrow of the restrictions imposed by British rule in the Near East, it is obvious that we must have ready as a substitute some equally effective guarantee of orderly government in that quarter.

That it should now be necessary to reaffirm that such order can only be maintained by a considerable exercise of armed force sounds incredible, but the tide of anti-militarism has carried some of us into a domain of queer reasoning in which our very policemen seem liable to be charged with endangering the world's peace. I do not pretend to fathom the logic with which Senator Borah and others oppose on the one hand every plan of American participation in the forcible maintenance of world order, and on the other favor what would amount to a destruction of European control over the turbulent factions of the Orient. But it is clear, on the face of things, that a realization of both these propositions at once would be highly embarrassing.

The theorist who talks of total disarmament and of the self-determination of small states in the same breath is difficult to follow. The Oriental tribes are impervious to economic threats. And as far as the safeguard of total disarmament is concerned, it is surely not forgotten that the Mohammedan peoples are skilled in the use of a number of weapons not mentioned in the Washington discussions. Of the latent and demonstrated efficacy of these every British soldier who has seen Eastern service is fully aware. There is no derogation to the rights of Oriental peoples in saying that the world at large has its rights also, and that if these are not forcibly assured we may yet live to see our Oscar ships boarded by swarthy pirates in the Eastern seas, and the white population of Asia and Eurasia flying before a surge of curiously-shaped steel, under circumstances and with consequences too picturesque to mention.

In short, if British rule in the Orient is to be supplanted, it must be replaced with some stronger sanction than we seem willing to take our share in providing. But many perils are forcing themselves on our reluctant attention, and may serve to stimulate our political ingenuity. Northcliffe has begun to unveil the seriousness of the Moslem threat. As long ago as the peace conference at Versailles, General Bliss drew attention to the danger of a combination of Slav and other disaffected states in Eastern Europe against Anglo-Saxon and Latin civilization in the West. Lloyd George mentioned the possibility of a federation of small states in the Balkans that might easily form the nucleus of a rapidly-growing empire, after the pattern of Germany in the last century. Neither this danger nor that of a Mohammedan array against Christendom is a remote or visionary peril, or one that will leave America unaffected, even from a material point of view. And short of a military alliance among all the countries capable and willing to maintain the peace, it is hard to see how it can be met.

The mischief about the present league of nations is that it is sufficiently well defined to give its decisions a certain color of authority, but too infirmly organized to insure their being obeyed. Thus it has had no difficulty in confirming the French mandate over Cilicia, but it can not prevent France from bargaining with the mandate as if it represented French property in fee simple, or from handing over to Turkey a portion of the mandated territory in return for railway concessions. There are several kinds of private malpractice to which this presumption of France's might be compared, and the mildest of them is gambling with trust funds. But the fact of more general importance is that the international league in its present state is too loose an affair to define the titles it confers. The court of international justice that has just been established at The Hague is rather like one of the pioneer law courts in Western America, which were countenanced by the settlers as lending a touch of dignity to the community, but were utterly disregarded when the decisions proved unwelcome to prominent citizens who happened also to be good marksmen. Undoubtedly the judicial body of the league will evolve toward greater utility, just as the Western law courts did, but this will involve a broadening of its authority and a sanctioning of its verdicts with united arms. Till then it will be a court in name only, liable to all the pioneer abuses, and as apt to provoke war as to prevent it. In the meantime we are surprised to find ourselves contemplating France as the outlaw and bad man of Europe, but she seems bent on forcing her friends to regard her as such.

The particular inequity of the Angora bargain is that it plays directly into the hands of the Pan-Moslem empire that Kemal is so determined to establish. France and Moslem! Did not Charles Martel fight at Tours for something or other that is relevant here?

INDIVIDUALITIES.

College professors are not so numerous among the officials of the Harding régime as during Woodrow Wilson's era, but one shining exception is the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Charles W. Pugsley, who was holding the chair of animal industry in the State University of Nebraska and was also editing a farm paper when he responded to his friend and colleague's offer to aid him in Washington. Dr. Pugsley has been what is graphically described as a real "dirt" farmer, in addition to teaching many of its branches and writing about it as luminously and at as great length as his chief, Mr. Wallace. He is a finished speaker and bubbling over with zeal and enthusiasm for the cause which he officially espoused.

The Hon. Mrs. Hope-Morley, wife of the heir of Lord Hollenden, who was formerly Mary Sidney Gardner, is the originator of the idea for the wedding gift from all the Marys in the United Kingdom to Princess Mary. The present will be a chest of household linen and napery. The chest itself will be made by British wood carvers and every inch of the bed linen, curtains, bedspreads, dininghall and culinary napery is to come from hand looms in the industrial art schools from the stormy islands north of Scotland to the fisher population of the Channel islands. Her name, "Mary," will be hand embroidered on every article, but with no royal arms or other device of heraldry. All the Marys in the court set are interested and have divided the task into minute sections and every Mary who wishes may give her bit, but none must give more than a few pennies. Lady Mary Cambridge has taken over all the retainers of the palaces from St. James and Buckingham to Windsor, and the seats of royalty in York and about Cowes. Lady Mary Irene Curzon, daughter of the lamented Mary Leiter, is busy in and about her home county and her residence portion of London. Mrs. Hope-Morley was one of the former playmates and chums of the royal bride-to-be, though she is some three years older, and Mary Frances Alice, the elder of the little daughters of the Hope-Morleys, is the first of the scores of god-children which the princess possesses in every part of the world.

Mr. Lewis Einstein, who has just been appointed minister from this country to Prague, capital of Czecho-Slovakia, is among the literati of the foreign service and has acquired as excellent a reputation as an author as for statecraft. He has been in the diplomatic service for more than twenty years and has managed some exceedingly delicate negotiations, especially in Constantinople in 1915. His book of this period, entitled "Inside Constantinople During the Dardanelles Expedition," is considered one of the most valuable records of that tragic era and has been translated into several Eastern tongues. Mr. and Mrs. Einstein have taken over the blue palace which the recent minister, Mr. Richard Crane, had purchased for legation purposes about a year ago. It possesses the admirable qualities of serving both as home and chancellery, with adequate room for the most ambitious entertainments, together with sleeping quarters for the bachelors of the staff. Mrs. Einstein was Miss Helen Ralli of New York, and her marriage to the diplomat took place in 1904. Since that day the Einsteins have lived in practically every habitable part of the earth and in some parts which might not come under that description. They were in Bulgaria during some exciting years, and in Peking when conditions were tending toward tragedies. Prague, under the benign rule of the scholarly Dr. Masaryk, is one of the most delightful cities of Europe and, with a well-equipped home in waiting, the Einsteins are among the envied of the foreign service.

Written at Florence.

O world, in very truth thou art too young;
When wilt thou learn to wear the garb of age?
World, with thy covering of yellow flowers,
Hast thou forgot what generations sprung
Out of thy loins and loved thee and are gone?
Hast thou no place in all thy heritage
Where thou dost only weep, that I may come
Nor fear the mockery of thy yellow flowers?
O world, in very truth thou art too young.
The heroic wealth of passionate emprise
Built these fair cities for thy naked plains:
How hast thou set thy summer growth among
The broken stones which were their palaces!
Hast thou forgot the darkness where he lies
Who made thee beautiful, or have thy bees
Found out his grave to build their honeycombs?

O world, in very truth thou art too young:
They gave thee love who measured out thy skies,
And, when they found for thee another star,
Who made a festival and straightway hung
The jewel on thy neck. O merry world,
Hast thou forgot the glory of those eyes
Which first look'd love in thine? Thou hast not furl'd
One banner of thy bridal car for them.
O world, in very truth thou art too young.
There was a voice which sang about thy spring,
Till winter froze the sweetness of his lips,
And lo, the worms had hardly left his tongue
Before thy nightingales were come again.
O world, what courage hast thou thus to sing?
Say, has thy merriment no secret pain,
No sudden weariness that thou art young?

You and I.

The winter wind is wailing, sad and low,
Across the lake and through the rustling sedge;
The splendor of the golden afterglow
Gleams through the blackness of the great yew hedge,
And this I read on earth and in the sky:
We ought to be together, you and I.

Rapt through its rosy changes into dark
Fades all the west; and through the shadowy trees,
And in the silent uplands of the park,
Creeps the soft sighing of the rising breeze.
It does but echo to my weary sigh,
We ought to be together, you and I.

My hand is lonely for your clasping, dear;
My ear is tired waiting for your call;
I want your strength to help, your laugh to cheer,
Heart, soul, and senses need you, one and all;
I turn from the others with the longing sigh:
We ought to be together, you and I.

We want each other so to comprehend
The dream, the hope, things planned or seen or wrought;
Companion, comforter, and guide, and friend,
As much as love asks love does thought need thought. --
Life is so short, so fast the lone hours fly,
We ought to be together, you and I.

EUGENE FIELD AND A GREAT EDITOR.

Melville Stone's Story of the Chicago Daily News.

One reason why the successful man's account of how he did it is no longer convincing may be the growing belief that no one ever succeeds unaided. The very few people, nowadays, who claim to be "self-made" address themselves to a dwindling audience. Their claim, as Andrew Lang once said, is interesting only in so far as it relieves their Creator of a grave responsibility. It is generally recognized that collaborators of some kind, human or circumstantial, must conspire in the fulfillment of every man's design, and that when he attempts to expound the result he is, relatively speaking, where Marshal Foch would be should he attempt to explain how he won the European war. When due credit has been given to the initiative and foresight of the executive, a large number of other causes remain to be accounted for—some of them beyond apprehension, and if the director of a successful enterprise is candid he will acknowledge, in looking back on the achievement, something fortuitous in his discovery of the combination that "worked."

Melville Stone evidently has that candor. He seems to minimize, if anything, his personal share in the success of the Chicago Daily News, and even his acumen in bringing together the staff that helped make it successful. And yet, in founding this paper in 1874 he appears at the outset to have challenged and overcome, with very little support, almost all the difficulties that can attend such a venture, from lack of capital to the enmity of corrupt competitors. The principles of the new journal were at that time revolutionary. It required a degree of courage, in those days, to proceed on the theory that a newspaper's main function is to convey useful information, or that a private citizen's domestic affairs and the more squalid annals of the police court are irrelevant to that purpose, or that a newspaper should be cheap in nothing but price. The Daily News sold at a cent a copy, and this, apparently, without any concession to the advertisers, who were taught to regard themselves as uncommonly fortunate to obtain space that might otherwise have been filled with news. The first capitalist of the enterprise was an English "remittance man," whose remittances were neither large nor dependable, and whose working contribution to the paper was nil. That, under these circumstances, the original sheet should have eventually developed into an independent organ of more than metropolitan importance argues a tenacity of intelligent purpose on the part of its editor that can not be too much admired. But Mr. Stone pays a sportsmanlike tribute to luck as a factor in the achievement, and a most generous one to the work of the brilliant staff he gradually gathered about him. He believes his greatest contribution to the modern newspaper to have been the policy of placing the various news and editorial departments in the hands of specialists. This may be so. But one of the principle causes of his success as an editor was something he fails to mention—something of which, perhaps, he was hardly conscious, though it appears clearly enough in the tone of his story. It was Stone's genius for friendship that gave his varied and none too docile staff its cooperative strength and remarkable esprit de corps—since there is no other word for it.

Another source of strength in such a newspaper is that its rivals can not openly attack it on any ground save one they dare not admit. And in meeting less open kinds of persecution the Daily News soon proved itself capable of outdoing the most sinister inventions of its enemies:

The Chicago Post and Mail, owned by the McMullen brothers, enjoyed the Associated Press privilege. Nevertheless, the Post and Mail was daily pirating our news. No sooner would a dispatch appear in our early edition than it would be seized upon by that paper. Mr. Flinn, who, as I have said, was chief editorial assistant, set a trap. The morning paper of that day announced great distress in Serbia. We framed a dispatch, and published it in our noon edition on Saturday, December 2, as follows:

SAD STORY OF DISTRESS IN SERBIA.

London, Dec. 2.—A correspondent of the Times writing from Serbia, where he had spent many weeks, says that the country presents a gloomy picture to the traveler. The land is devastated and the people are starving.

Everywhere he found men and women crying for food. He could see in any large village hundreds of young women in a state of seminudity. It has been a hard matter for the priests to keep the populace under their control. Children are starving by thousands throughout the country.

The men, young and old, go through the streets shouting for bread, cursing the rich for not coming to their aid. A few days ago the mayor of the provincial town of Sivil issued a proclamation ending with the ominous words: "Er us silt la Etall ius nel hom cheli" (the municipality can not aid).

Upon reading this, the people, led by the women of the town, organized a riot, in the course of which a dozen houses were pillaged and over twenty persons were brutally murdered.

The 3 o'clock edition of the Post and Mail for the same day contained the dispatch word for word, the only change being made in the caption, which appeared in the Post and Mail as "Horrid Starvation in Serbia."

The dispatch was dropped from the 3 o'clock edition of the News and did not appear in the 5 o'clock edition of the Post and Mail, as some friend of the McMullens, who owned that paper, called their attention to the fact that reading the supposed foreign words backward, they became: "The McMullens will steal this sure." It was too late, however, for they had been deceived by the item and the harm was done.

As the News did not issue a Sunday paper and as we wished the widest publicity given to the hoax, we asked the Times and the Tribune to reprint it with explanations on Sunday. They did so, and the Post and Mail was literally laughed to death. In less than two years we bought all that was left of it, including its franchise in the Associated Press and its material, for $15,000.

Later, this device was employed in an even more ingenious way:

It became evident that the Chicago Tribune was gaining much fame from its foreign service, a good share of which was pirated from the Daily News. A trap was set. Matthew Arnold had just made a tour of the United States, had lectured in Chicago, and had returned to England. As every one knew, he was an acrid critic. Perhaps the reader remembers the story of Robert Louis Stevenson, if it has ever been told in print. I am not sure.

Stevenson lay out in Apia, in the Samoan Islands, nearing his end with tuberculosis. The death of Matthew Arnold was announced.

"Ah," said Stevenson, faintly, between paroxysms of coughing, "that is too bad. He won't like God!"

With Arnold's temperament in mind, we saw an opportunity to deal with the Tribune. After talking the matter over, I shut William Morton Payne up in a room and he prepared what purported to be a cable message from London, quoting an article, on his visit to Chicago, contributed by Matthew Arnold to the Pall Mall Journal. It was admirably done.

Whitelaw Reid joined me in the scheme. I sent him Payne's "dispatch." He caused it to be printed in one copy of the New York Tribune, which found its way into the hands of the New York correspondent of the Chicago Tribune. The correspondent, acting under instructions, telegraphed the whole thing to his Chicago paper, and the next day it was printed and created a sensation in our city.

We of the Daily News assumed that it was genuine and interviewed those whom Arnold was credited with having roundly scored for bad manners and undeniable ignorance in the Pall Mall Journal. The men whose names were mentioned in Arnold's alleged article spoke back bitterly. The Tribune on its editorial page chimed in with the denunciations of the caustic British critic. The thing went on for two or three days, and, after every one had had his say, I cabled Arnold a full personal explanatory message, and of course received from him a reply to the effect that he had made no such communication to the press. This I published, adding that there was no such paper as the Pall Mall Journal, and indeed exposing the whole business.

The Chicago Tribune was not merely convicted of having stolen the "dispatch," which was not worth stealing, but of adding humbug and deluding the readers.

As sole proprietor of the Daily News, Stone carried his innovations further. In the new domain of what he calls "detective journalism" he himself was an active contributor, tracking down such celebrated malefactors as D. D. Spencer, the absconding president of the State Savings Bank of Chicago, and A. Moore, the supervisor of the "West Town" in the same city. His descriptions of these exploits, as well as his brief life stories of extraordinary criminals with whom he came professionally into contact, compose some of the best pages in the book. But a greater interest attaches to certain personalities more famous than notorious, identified with the Daily News in this decade of its glory. The better-known names among these are the "five sweet symphonies" of Colonel Harvey, Mr. Dooley, Bill Nye, George Ade, and that amazing and immortal creator of beautiful nonsense, Eugene Field.

Field conducted the column called "Sharps and Flats" in the Morning News (a tributary of Stone's evening paper), and put into it some of his best work. The author's personal reminiscences of him add something to the fine memoir by Slaton Thompson, another radiant name in this constellation of morning stars:

They were rollicking, happy days—those that I spent with Eugene Field. As I have said, I met him first in October, 1873. Not long after, he and his brother Roswell went to the St. Louis Journal and I frequently called upon them. Gene, for every one so called him, had hardly begun to betray his extraordinary genius. His environment was not such as to awaken him. He plodded, writing well, but not brilliantly. Then, dissatisfied, he went to Kansas City and St. Joseph, Missouri. At "St. Joe," the home of his wife, he felt more at ease. There he wrote "Little Boy Blue," that tender, heart-racking verse which has brought comforting tears to the eyes of so many thousands of bereaved mothers. There, too, finding as his editor-in-chief Major Bittinger, a brave old freer, he began the pranks which ever after delighted his soul.

There, too, I fear, he for a brief period indulged in the flowing bowl, and earned a reputation which altogether quite unjustly followed him through his after life. They tell a story of him that he owed an account at a saloon. He always owed an account. On this occasion the debit was written on a slate and hung upon the wall. One evening he entered the place. The proprietor felt that whatever the indebtedness, Gene's delightful society had furnished ample compensation, and forthwith wiped off the score and with some degree of pride announced to his debtor that the bill was settled.

"Indeed," said Field, nothing abashed, "I believe that it is the rule here when a man pays his shot, you treat the house; is it not so?"

"Yes," reluctantly and dubiously replied the saloon-keeper.

"Then," said Field, "everybody will step up to the bar and have a drink on the house."

The next meeting between Stone and Field occurred ten years later in the back row of an opera house in Denver, where Stone rolled in during one of the many trips he devoted to avoiding the accumulation of moss. This encounter was one of the happiest accidents in the editor's career, as it meant Field's engagement to return to Chicago as a Morning News contributor:

He had tired of "St. Joe" and had gone over to Kansas City and back to St. Louis and finally had taken leave of the effete Middle East and landed in Denver. He joined O. H. Rothaker and F. J. V. Skiff, two of the most brilliant editors of their day, in the conduct of the Denver Tribune. Here Field made his paper and himself famous by the publication of certain beautiful verses, and by certain characteristic practical jokes which set every one aroar. He wrote his charming poem, "The Wanderer"—the moan of a sea shell far from its home on a Colorado mountain top—and issued it as from the pen of Helena Modjeska, the actress. He went out to Ouray, made the acquaintance and the undying friendship of Daniel Day, editor of the Solid Muldoon, a fine type of the editorial cowboy, and penned at Gold Hill, under the shadow of the peaks of the Rocky range, in a primitive frontier tavern, "Casey's Table d'Hôte." Then back in Denver, when Oscar Wilde was announced for a lecture, he dressed his associate Rothaker in velvet jacket and knickerbockers and decorated him with a huge chrysanthemum, drove through the Denver streets and received the plaudits of the citizens, who thought him the host of the veritable Irish poet. Here, too, he sent for Bill Nye, then editing the Laramie (Wyoming) Boomerang, and gave him a dinner which has not been forgotten to this day. And he tilted his lance at "Brick" Pomeroy, who at the moment was a Denver editor.

His connection with the Chicago Morning News, which continued till his death, is a genial commentary on the spirit of the time:

No sooner had Field arrived in Chicago than he began his pranks. He came in the early fall. A month later we reached Thanksgiving Day. It was our custom to give each married employee of the paper a turkey on that occasion. But not for Field. He would have none of it. A day or two before the holiday I received a formal letter, written in his inimitable script, suggesting that if it was all the same to me he would prefer a suit of clothes, as he had no particular use for a turkey. The state prison was forty miles away and the warden was a personal friend. From him I obtained a suit of "stripes" that would fit my petitioner, and when Thanksgiving Day arrived, the "suit of clothes" was presented in a package which when opened surprised and delighted him beyond measure. He was tall, slender, smooth-shaven, almost bald, the little hair he had being cut very short.

The home of the Daily News was a primitive place. As the paper grew, we rented adjoining buildings and connected them by doors cut through the walls. I converted the top floor of one of these structures into editorial offices. It was really a loft. There were three small offices in front and rear where the light could be secured and between was a long hall practically vacant. To heat the place—there was no steam—there was an old-fashioned "cannon stove."

Now and then a country editor would call and I would assign a reporter to show him over the establishment. In his wanderings he would reach this loft. While the conducting reporter dilated upon the wonders of a metropolitan newspaper, the door of one of the petty dens would open and a tall, gaunt creature, almost bald, and smooth-shaven, in prison stripes and an old pair of carpet slippers, would step out, seize a poker, and proceed to shake down the ashes in the stove. This done, he would set about sweeping the floor and raising a cloud of dust that would choke a behemoth. The visiting editor, gasping, would ask what this meant. With well-simulated embarrassment, the reporter would reply that he was afraid to explain. This was the skeleton in our closet. It was the one thing about the place that all the employees disapproved of, but did not dare to discuss. In strictest confidence, however, he would tell. The editor of the paper was a friend of the warden of the penitentiary, and took advantage of that fact. "The man before you," he would say, "is a life convict. He is a trusty. To save expense, Mr. Stone has induced the warden, Major McLaughry, to let him have this poor wretch to serve as janitor for the Daily News office. It is all wrong, but you can well understand, we can not afford to open our mouths about it." The editor would join with the sympathetic reporter in denouncing the outrage, while Field, the wretched convict, was chuckling over the prank. In one case, a week later, down in Central Illinois, a weekly paper appeared with an editorial pouring out its vials of wrath upon McLaughry and myself for this shameless performance.

The fooling was often of the highly "practical" kind the Elizabethan journalists used to favor:

We went to the theatre. They were playing "The Mikado," with Roland Reed as Koko. We sat well down in front. Suddenly while Reed was singing one of his best lines Field, who was an actor of great ability, screwed his face into unspeakable shape and poor Reed was forced to stop and begin all over again. Often if there was a child in the seat back of him, Field would turn and make a face which would set the infant bawling. The mother, having no idea of the cause, would search in vain for an offending pin, while Field's sides were shaking with delight. Yet again, he and I were seated near the stage, and "East Lynne" or some equally tear-forcing play was being produced. At the moment of high tension, when there was profound silence throughout the house, there burst out a loud "Ha! ha! ha!" and then Field turned to a quiet old gentleman seated by his side and silently denounced him with a look of amazement and condemnation. The audience took it up and all recognized the poor-old fellow as the culprit. He blushed and, when the curtain fell, quietly took his hat and slipped out, and did not return. Field, who was almost a ventriloquist, was the real offender.

But here is a better example of Field's humor. This passage has been saved for the last, since the second story in it is apt to leave the Californian reader too shocked to read further:

I had a place in the country to which he was always welcome, invited or uninvited. He would throw himself on my bed and write by the hour. Also, if he was short of anything, he did not hesitate about helping himself from my wardrobe. One day he called on me in the city, carrying a bundle under his arm. This he deposited with:

"There is something my wife told me to bring you. I don't quite know what it is. I believe there's a shirt, and I know there's a pair of socks of yours, that have spoiled our wash for three weeks."

Then he turned and walked out.

In the spring of 1895 he went to California for a vacation. His health was not good. He tired of the continuous chatter about the "glorious climate." A cousin lived at Alameda. Eugene went to visit him. One morning, at breakfast, his cousin being absent, he began thus to his cousin's wife:

"I had a horrid dream last night. Yet now that I think of it, it was not so bad. I dreamed your husband was dead. And he approached the pearly gate. St. Peter was on guard. Edwin [that was the cousin's name] tried to enter, but Peter stopped him to find if his name was in the book. 'Who are you?' asked Peter. 'Mr. Field,' replied Edwin. 'Ah,' said Peter promptly, 'Mr. Eugene Field, walk right in. You are welcome.' 'No,' replied Edwin, 'not Eugene Field, but Edwin.' 'Then,' said Peter, 'I must examine my book.' He did so and Edwin's name was not there. So Edwin was told to go below. At the gate of the infernal regions was another guardian with cloven hoof and forked tail. And he, too, had a book. Edwin attempted to enter, but was not enrolled and was again turned away. I heard him cry in anguish: 'Great heavens, must I go back and live in the glorious climate of California?'"

Eugene Field died in his sleep, November 4, 1895, aged forty-five years.

When all too young, and much before his time, he died, there passed from us one who, though he had done much, and not a little that will endure, was surely at the very threshold of a very great career.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ended February 4, 1922, were $126,500,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $131,800,000; a decrease of $5,300,000.

The railroad labor situation would be ludicrous if it were not so serious (says the National City Bank of New York in its monthly letter). The rates fixed by the Labor Board for common labor are so far above those prevailing outside of the railroad service that the companies are finding it practicable to contract out much of their work and save 20 pecans and peaches at Fort Valley, Georgia; he sets out his views in effective language as follows:

"It seems the unanimous opinion of the farmers, the actual farmers who produce crops, that only one thing is needed—to be permitted to sell a crop for more than it costs to make it and haul it to market.

"Lending a farmer money to make a crop out of which he doesn't get cost does not benefit him. It merely postpones bankruptcy. There can be no recovery until crops sell at a profit.

"There can be no profit so long as a law-made agency takes the major part of the farmer's crop, representing his year's labor, and turns it over to the organized workers for their few days' work hauling it to market. That is the crux of the situation.

"The farmer wants no special legislation, no representation on the Reserve Board, no preferred jobs, he merely wants the special legislation favoring other workers removed, in other words, that every tub stand on its own bottom, and let each man earn what he can.

"Nothing will save the farming industry but a deep cut in freight rates. We are all merely producing tonnage for the railroads, who merely collect from the unorganized workers, and turn it over to the organized workers. The latter punish when the politicians fail to do their bidding; we farmers don't.

"When the Chicago Labor Board fixes a railroad man's pay at a higher price than he can earn in other open pursuits, it is no largess of the Labor Board. It is a purely arithmetical proposition. The excess given to the railroad worker is taken from what the farm worker earns.

"The impracticable humanitarian will say that the higher pay given the railroad laborer will put up to a 'living wage' the pay of the laborer in other pursuits, but the reverse is true, for the more paid to the railroad laborer, the less of the price there is left to pay the other labor.

"It is not a question between capital and labor, but it is between the different classes of labor, as to which shall get its fair share, or more than its share.

"Take Georgia's approximately ten thousand cars of peaches. In even figures, of the proceeds of the sale of this fruit this year, selling got 8 per cent., transportation got 62 per cent., and production got 30 per cent., out of which to pay all the labor that grew and picked and packed the fruit, as well as for a few such items as crates, fertilizers, spray material, wagons, mules, etc.

"The labor alone that hauled a car of peaches for four or five days got more than all the labor that plowed, pruned, harrowed, sprayed, picked, and packed the crop, nearly a year's work.

"Georgia's watermelon shipments were almost as bad.

"The sorriest negro porter that rides a train for a few hours a day through our town gets more for his year's work than does the most intelligent, energetic, and efficient farmer for his year's work, averaging nearly twice as many hours a day. There isn't a farmer in the country who has gotten this year for his work as much as, not the best, but the sorriest such porter."

The press report of the proceedings of the Agricultural Conference held in Washington last week contained the following paragraph: "Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, offered a resolution in the Committee on Agriculture and Price Relations, to declare that men engaged in the agricultural field were 'entitled to a large reward for the services they give society.'"

In view of this manifestation of his interest in the farmer's deserts, we venture to refer Mr. Harris' letter to Mr. Gompers for consideration and reply.

It is a known fact that the general public does most of its buying of stocks when they are around their high levels. Thomas Gibson in his book, "Simple Principles of Investment," says: "About 80 per cent. of public buying is done at the approximate high prices and at the time when realizing sales would be the logical plan." Walter Bagehot, the English economist, put it in this expressive way: "At particular times a great many stupid people have a great deal of stupid money. . . . At intervals the money from these people—the blind capital, as we call it, of the country—is particularly large and craving; it seeks for some one to devour it, and there is 'plethora'; it finds some one, and there is 'speculation'; it is devoured, and there is 'panic.'"

When it comes to the buying of bonds and mortgages there is not the same sheepish tendency for people to come in at the top and not the same bad results if they do, provided they buy safe securities; but there is evident at present a somewhat related tendency among bond buyers that may lead to disaster in the end. This is the desire to get the same high yield on investments made today that one's neighbor is getting on bonds that he bought at the low point of May, 1920, or even as late as July or August of last year. Since May, 1920, bonds have moved up on the average nearly thirteen points in price and ten points of this advance has occurred since last July. On a twenty-five-year 5 per cent. bond this means a lowering of the yield which it gives by about one point or, say, from 7 per cent. to 6 per cent. American Telephone and Telegraph Company collateral trust 5s due 1946, for instance, sold as low as 77½ last year, at which price they gave an average annual yield of 6.90 per cent. if held to maturity. At present they are selling at 92 to yield 5.60 per cent. And Liberty Loan bonds, for which the yield bases are printed in the daily papers, give an excellent example of this change. Most people remember that not many months ago the Fourth Loan 4½s were selling to yield more than 5½ per cent.—at their lowest point of 1920 their yield to maturity was more than 6 per cent. At present it is down below 4½ per cent.

This advance in bond prices has been so rapid that many people do not realize the great change that has taken place. They had become accustomed to the higher yields; now they can not see why, if they could get 7 per cent. on long-term bonds with a good degree of safety last July, they can not do as well today.

The danger is that those investors who try to get as high a return on their money today as they themselves or their neighbors got a few months ago have to sacrifice a certain degree of safety to do so. There are, it is true, some classes of securities for which the demand has not been as great, or which do not enjoy an active market, which may still be purchased to give the high yield with the same amount of safety. But in those cases the buyer may be sacrificing the element of marketability (which, however, he may not need) or he may be purchasing a short-term investment which will not give him the high yield for long. In any event he should inquire carefully why it is possible for him to get that yield, and look with particular care into the safety of the investments that offers it.

parts. Under the union-made rules that have been in force this meant three shifts on a pump, but the company has been able to contract for the service at a saving of about 65 per cent.

It would seem to be time that the public waked up to the fact that the cost of operating the railroads is not wholly a matter between the companies and the employees, but of general concern. who write for suggestions to help them in choosing their investments ask specifically for recommendations of issues that give the same high returns that were available last summer. A farmer in Maine recently wrote, "I am fifty years old and do not wish to take much risk, but if I can safely invest in long-term bonds which will yield me 7 per cent. or more, I would like to do so instead of letting money remain in savings bank at 4 per cent." Another in West Virginia presented a still harder problem. He wrote, "The tax laws here amount almost to confiscation—over 3 per cent. of the face value of bonds. I have about $25,000 to invest and I want to invest it where I can earn reasonable interest, as high as possible with safety, but I do not want to invest in anything where the element of speculation is high. Can you recommend any sound bonds upon which I could earn as that probably the safest investment to give the 7 per cent. return which he desired was in real estate mortgage bonds or farm mortgages, provided they were purchased through houses of the best reputation in those fields. But it was pointed out that he must not lose sight of the fact that real estate values are inflated at the present time and that mortgages made on the basis of this inflation are not as well secured as such mortgages of the past. In the field of long-term corporation bonds, which seemed to be what he had in mind, it was suggested that he confine the investment of his savings to such issues as the good second-grade railroad bonds, like New York Central debenture 6s, or to the best public utility bonds, like Pacific Gas and Electric refunding 5s. These were selling to yield only about 6 per cent. The real estate mortgage bonds and farm mortgages therefore had an advantage on the basis of interest return. And the record of such securities has been excellent; they have made most satisfactory investments for a great many people. They are not readily marketable, but under ordinary conditions the best of the issuing houses will take them back at a small discount from a client who has to sell. Investors who bought these securities during the years while active bonds were declining in price were indeed fortunate. The fluctuation of the marketplace disturbed neither their minds nor their pocket-books. Just now there is this uncertain situation in regard to new issues because of the inflation in real estate values, for if these values should drop, some of the mortgages that have been made in recent years would not be well secured.

Another drawback to real estate and farm mortgage securities is that they are usually for short terms. There is reason to believe that interest rates will go still lower, and if they do, the man who owns a long-term bond, who will be getting the present rate when others are reinvesting at lower rates, will still have an advantage. And if he owns a bond that enjoys a ready market, he will be in position to profit by the advance in bond prices which will accompany the decline in interest rates.

The investor therefore has to decide between the long and the short-term investment, with the odds in favor of the long. Then he can think of yield, but his first consideration should be for the safety of the investment. Many corporations that have been hard hit by the business depression are now selling securities to pull them out of their difficulties. These offerings are based largely on the showing of the past. Increased competition of the future may result in the elimination of some of these issues. The high interest rate which they bear may be the bait on a hook which is unsafe for the investor to go after. The corporation that has good securities to sell no longer needs to offer the high interest returns of last year, and the investor should be critical of the ones that do. He should investigate to assure himself of the company's ability to continue to pay the interest on the bonds it is selling. And he should also note whether the bond can be called in and paid off by the company at a few points above what he is paying for it. Such a callable feature might upset the permanency of his investment just at a time when it would be most difficult to reinvest to advantage. Above all he should look to the safety of his investments in times like these.—World's Work.

German reparations and the Allied debt to America are the two most troublesome situations in foreign financing, according to Cyrus Peirce, well-known San Francisco investment banker.

Peirce, one of the leading California financial authorities, is of the opinion that the German situation is one deterrent to economic readjustment and that in the end the bill for reparation must be reduced.

But here in California there looms a serious menace in the proposed power bill, Peirce declared last week in an address before the Business Men's Club of Sacramento. In discussing these important problems he said in part:

"It seems to be generally settled in the minds of economists that Germany can not pay as heavy a bill as was sent to her by the Versailles conference.

"Lloyd George, as well as some of our best-posted Americans, seem to realize this fact. France and French politicians take the stand that every dollar levied upon Germany must be paid whether Germany is able to do so or not.

"Now, this is not a political question, but rather a question of world economics.

"Is Germany going to be allowed to survive, or is she going to be junked? Germany is a bankrupt debtor. Are her creditors going to allow her to continue in business, earn a living and a surplus, and apply that surplus to the payment of her debts as a going concern, or is she to be sent to the scrap heap and sold for junk?

"If Germany as a business entity is destroyed there can not help but be a reaction on the countries of Europe, and also on this country. In the end the bill for reparation will be reduced, not to what Germany ought to pay—for she ought to pay with every dollar she has and every drop of blood there is left in her—but rather to what Germany can pay and keep on going.

"It is the uncertainty regarding this situation, and the time of final settlement, that is one of the deterrent factors to a readjustment of the world financial situation."

A short time ago this West Virginia man's problem could have been solved by the purchase of Liberty Bonds, which are tax free in every state. They would have given the 5½ per cent. he desired. Even now the suggestion was made that he put half his funds in Liberty Bonds and the other half in good grade preferred stocks, also exempt from tax in West Virginia, which would raise the average return up to the rate he desired. ## BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

Margot's—or should we say Mrs. Herbert Asquith's?—visit is a reminder of the always moot question concerning the ethics of diaries. To the best of my knowledge, the psychologists have not explained the diary impulse, but it seems to be a normal human one. Diaries are usually kept by disappointed and misunderstood people. The diary is a last court of appeal. Posterity at least will render them justice seems to be the forlorn hope of many an embittered diarist. Others, however, like the classic Pepys, seemed not to write for posterity so much as for self-satisfaction. And yet again we have the modern brand of which Mrs. Asquith is such a perfect type, who seem to diarize because the process has greater possibilities of the sensational than any other literary recreation. In justice to the sprightly Margot, one should remember that most readers, particularly readers of intimate letters and journals, love sensationalism and that it was her one best bet to make all previous intimate publications pale to ashes of roses against her scarlet. In proportion as the critics and the public screamed abuse the royalties mounted and editions multiplied themselves. For even the public does not scream till it is hurt. One remembers the story—authentic or other, but anyway to the point—of Mrs. Asquith's telling Mr. Asquith what her book was netting her. His supposed retort was: "My dear! I hope it is not worth that much!" The story quite adequately supports the theory that pecuniary pressure is behind the publication of diaries that are, to say the least, vivaciously candid. Mrs. Asquith has been asked by interviewers if caustic criticism has ever caused her to regret publishing her famous book. "No," she said, "I don't think I ever have." Observe her retort was not a pugnacious "Certainly not!" It was, on the other hand, discriminating and reflective. It is just possible that Margot had in mind her numerous friends, members of the "flower of British aristocracy," who have gone into business, become modistes, opened beauty parlors, and even laundries. It is just possible that on reflection she still decided that she preferred to have metaphorically rather than literally laundered her illustrious acquaintance.

From the historic and scientific viewpoint, diaries are of course important. Margot's very own, if any copy survive the numerous readings it is subjected to, will doubtless be a boon to future historians. Historians, poor devils, have rather a dry time of it. They are entitled to what fragmentary illumination they may find in a stray intimate diary. From the ethical viewpoint the case for diaries is not so clear. There are, of course, numerous defenders who claim that the same principle that holds for the legitimacy of news and of "publicity" in general holds for published letters and journals. I am not so sure. I suspect that it is their own taste for the piquant that is father to the argument. Publicity, in so far as it tones up the morale of the country, is one thing. It is scarcely identical with violating the confidence of one who has written or spoken to you in confidence. Our lives, of course, should be open books, but one is nevertheless entitled to a little privacy. And if the moments of relaxation and expansion that one indulges in with intimate friends is to be made liable to publication—! Well, we may as well all become veritable lawyers so far as the discretion of social intercourse is concerned. Write no letters, or if you must, cut your information to the bone. Be telegraphic and avoid personalities. That in itself might be a desirable reform for most of us. Letter writing, once considered an art, though rather an effeminate one, has deteriorated anyway. It would not be much loss, except as Mr. George succinctly intimates somewhere, to the lawyers. Yes, if the rage for published intimacies would cause us to give pause and spend six-bits for a telegram, many a regret might be saved. But the potential diary will hardly do what all the aggregate experience of litigating mankind has failed to do. We shall probably still continue to write fatuous inanities to friends whom we never suspect of the treachery of a diary.

But criticism, whether ethical or not, does not seem to please Margot. According to the interview published in the New York Times Mrs. Asquith stated that "some people complain because you print things about people who are still alive. Others complain that you print them about those that are dead. . . . One set of critics object to half the topics you discuss. Another set objects to the other half. If you do as they say, you print nothing." This might be considered the best argument in the world why "nothing" of a diary should be printed—because it is bound to offend. However, one sympathizes with a bread-winning diarist who logically reasons that one set of critics mathematically cancels the other set. The net result, algebraically of course, not actually, is no criticism at all—in other words carte blanche for a diarist ambitious of putting all predecessors and competitors in the shade. Mrs. Asquith summed up the situation by declaring it was all a matter of taste. And we can merely echo her discriminating verdict—de gustibus. R. G.

Notes of Books and Authors

Another volume in their Uniform Edition of the Works of Leonard Merrick is promised by E. P. Dutton & Co. for spring publication. It will be "One Man's View," with an introduction by Granville Barker.

Eden Phillpotts makes another new departure in "Pan and the Twins," which the Macmillan Company published on January 24th. It is an old world fantasy of Pan the Pasturer, friend of villagers, sharer of human misery, consoler of human grief. Twin brothers of Roman birth, separated in infancy, find a friend in Pan, and their sad and glorious adventures are woven into a web of a story of unusual pattern.

"Will Shakespeare," like Miss Dane's earlier play, "A Bill of Divorcement," is arousing a great deal of discussion. The author says: "The play does not claim to be true to history; it is no more than an attempt to suggest the nature of the experiences that went to the development of Shakespeare's genius." The London Telegraph describes it as interesting and arresting—as a play by Clemence Dane in an Elizabethan setting, centering around Shakespeare, Marlowe, Anne Hathaway, the queen, and the Dark Lady of the Sonnets is bound to be. It will probably be produced in New York before long.

"Low Ceilings," W. Douglas Newton's latest book, published by the Appletons, is one of the ten leading English novels of the year which have been chosen for a contest for the Femina Vie Heureuse Prize. Some of the other authors whose books are listed are A. S. M. Hutchinson, Francis Brett Young, Sheila Kaye-Smith, Frank Swinnerton, Walter de la Mare, and the author of "Vera."

Norman Angell, author of "The Great Illusion," and more recently of "Fruits of Victory," has arrived in this country for a lecture tour which will include most of the larger cities from Boston to Los Angeles. Some of the topics Mr. Angell will discuss are "Can Democracy Endure?" "Fruits of Victory," and "Ireland, Imperialism, and Anglo-American Relations."

Vilhjalmur Stefansson, author of "The Friendly Arctic," went into the office of the Macmillan Company a few days ago with half a dozen pieces of the first cloth ever made from the wool of the musk-ox. It is being prepared experimentally by a specialist in Leeds University. In quality it ranges from something like a fine homespun to a soft, wide weave similar to angora. The report will be finished in a few months, and we will know whether the Arctic is so friendly that it will increase our wool supply extensively.

A life of Danton, famous leader of the French Revolution, translated from the French of Louis Madelin, has just been published by Alfred A. Knopf. It begins with Danton's turbulent childhood—a boy hideously scarred by smallpox, wild, and refractory. The early chapters reveal the man's life in miniature. He was an instrument of the "people's rage," he possessed all the mob attributes—violence, and generosity, disorder and sentimentality, venality and fury. It was Robespierre who finally broke him, but even then, when Danton stood on the scaffold, he was still the bull at bay, roaring, "Show my head to the people! It is worth it!"

Fannie Hurst has engaged passage on the Olympic and will sail on February 18th for Egypt, Italy, and France. While abroad, she will finish a novel on which she is working, and which will be published by Harper & Brothers, who brought out her first novel, "Star Dust," last year.

It is announced that the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation has secured the motion-picture rights of A. S. M. Hutchinson's "If Winter Comes," now the best-selling novel throughout the English-speaking world, and that the picture will be made in England in Joseph Conrad, who regards Hudson as a master of English prose, said to Ford Madox Hueffer that "how he does it" is a mystery. Richard Le Gallienne has just been discussing Hudson's style in a review in the New York Times Book Review of Hudson's "A Shepherd's Life," which was recently brought out in an American edition by E. P. Dutton & Co. Says Mr. Le Gallienne in his very interesting attempt to estimate the source and quality of the peculiar charm of Hudson's work: "Mr. Hudson writes as though there had never been such a thing as literature before. There is a divine innocence about his language, as though the words were being used for the first time, as though he were writing all alone in the golden morning of the world. And, so far as the secret of his style may be approached, this quality is evidently due in large measure to the life Mr. Hudson has loved to live, among great, calm, sun-silent spaces. His writing is steeped in happy silence, vast and shining."

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

The Romantic Lady.

The four tales—they are not short stories, neither are they short novels—that compose "The Romantic Lady" are of a genre not much practiced by writers of today. The reason is economical. Magazines want short stories of the mechanical variety that readers have grown used to and that publishers think the public demands. "Action" and brevity are the mainstays of the professional short-story writer. If a writer is interested in a theme which can not be translated in these terms—he may make a novel of it, but not a short story.

Mr. Arlen is primarily to be commended for practicing the literary form of the tale or conte. Short stories, after all, suit only a very special taste. If you have no mania for action between the covers of a book and if, moreover, you not only have no aversion, but rather a preference for character analysis and even descriptive and atmospheric writing, you are practically compelled to read a novel to satisfy your taste. And yet there are moments of relaxation when a longish yarn is just the sort of mental balm one wants. Decidedly, the story which is not based on a single episode of rather trivial dimensions—which seems to be the requisites of a short story—but which is yet not significant enough for a novel, has its place, or ought to have it in the literary scheme.

About Mr. Arlen's subject matter one is not quite so enthusiastic. His theme of romantic love seems somehow anachronistic. Romance in its most rudimentary form is apt to seem rather artificial in an age that has so many vital interests. However, Mr. Arlen writes well and will probably write better. We recommend more vital subjects as material for his undoubted talents.

THE ROMANTIC LADY. By Michael Arlen. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.

The Torrent.

A new translation of any novel by Vicente Blasco Ibañez has a timely interest at present, in view of the prevailing cult of Spanish things, but "The Torrent" has perhaps more than an ephemeral importance. It is a concentrated character study, somewhat on the French model, with an old theme: the love of an ambitious young politician for a talented opera singer and courtesan. If this were all, it would be nothing new or noteworthy. But in his handling of the story Ibañez has combined the central theme with an arresting picture of Spanish life, and has introduced, without any sacrifice in the intensity of the story, a number of memorable minor characters, who, while they do not mechanically influence the plot, lend it reality and perspective. The naturalism of Ibañez, which has given so much of his work a picturesque and atmospheric quality at the expense of coherence and dramatic force, is here blended with a consummately clear and sustained drame interieure, and his fusion of these elements approaches the highest art. The French have a remarkable skill in the demonstration of character within strictly confined space, and have displayed it brilliantly a thousand times in great narratives. But what (with a few exceptions, among whom Balzac is the greatest) they most lack is the genius to make relevant the seemingly irrelevant, and to bring their logically constructed interiors into contact with the untrimmed exuberance of life and nature. This gift is Ibañez's to a degree, though he does not yet seem to have perfected it. Each novel seems to carry the experiment a step further—to correlate the mixed elements a little more closely, and if the present book does not belie its promise, he may prove himself, not only a good novelist, but one of the greatest.

The possibilities in Spanish literature as a meeting ground for the very different and almost inimical literary methods of France and England appear to be worth considering, and no modern writer in Spain seems to be on a fairer way to realizing them than Ibañez.

One of the great virtues of the Spanish temperament has always been the power to take nature on her own terms, without hysteria or affectation or evasive sentimentalism. We know of nothing in modern literature exactly comparable to the tone in which the heroine of "The Torrent" rehearses the tale of her multitudinous amours and all their consequences or to the even-mindedness with which the author engages our belief in and respect for her, without falsifying or mitigating any of her deviations from the moral ideal. The translation is in admirable English.

An Interview with Okuma.

Marquis Okuma, whose death was recently announced, figures in Charles Edward Russell's book on the Philippine ("The Outlook for the Philippines"), which the Century Company has announced for February publication. Mr. Russell, in a recent talk with one of the editors, gave a vigorous and interesting picture of Japan's Grand Old Man, say his publishers.

"It was partly to see him," said Mr. Russell, "that I went to Japan. I regard his utterances on Philippine independence and Japan's relation thereto as the most important I heard. He was a most remarkable man and had had a marvelous career. He was almost the only person still alive in Japan who saw Perry's ships come into the tradition-locked Japanese port, so that there passed before him the whole of Japan's transformation into a modern civilization. He not only saw it, but took an active part in it, for he was continually in public life and had held every office in the Japanese cabinet, being premier at some of the most critical periods.

"He was tall for a Japanese, I think fully five feet eight inches in height, wore his sparse hair clipped so close to his skull that he seemed to be totally bald, and had brilliant and piercing eyes. In 1888 a fanatic native that thought his attitude too friendly toward foreigners had thrown a bomb at him. It had shattered his right leg and the marquis stumped about on a wooden peg, refusing to have an artificial limb.

"Neither this painful experience nor any of the vicissitudes of his public career (for he was often defeated) tinged his spirit with the least bitterness. He was always the same convinced and rather convincing optimist. Japanese statesmen are supposed to be compounded of secrecy and craft. This old man talked with an engrossing freedom. When I brought up the Twenty-One Demands, for instance I did it with misgivings and some circumlocution, supposing that as he was prime minister at the time the subject would be delicate with him. Not in the least. He plunged into it with cheerful abandon, told me the whole story from his point of view, and enlivened it with incident, which he told with a funny, dry little chuckle whenever it was something reasonably humorous. He never evaded a question that I put to him.

"With the single exception of Georges Clemenceau he was the strongest and most original mind I have met and one of the most delightful. I think I never had a better time with anybody. He seemed able to discuss anything, from tariffs to tubers, gardening being hardly short of a passion with him, and he talked in a quiet, steady, undemonstrative way like a man absolutely sure of himself, which he certainly was. He gave the impression of a seasoned old citizen of the world, kindly, sophisticated, and a little disillusioned, but with unconquerable hope and, for an Oriental, extraordinary faith in men.

"About the great war and its results he was a resolute optimist. 'The world gets better all the time,' was one of the last things he said to me the last time I saw him. 'It doesn't get worse, it gets better, and when it seems to be getting worse is very likely the time when it is really getting most surely better.' To the last he kept his vivid interest in politics and the news, presided at eighty-three over the great Waseda University, of which he was a founder, and (singularly enough) edited a magazine. He lived in an unpretentious house near the university, a two-story brick house that looked as if it might have been planned by an American."

AT THE PLAYERS THEATRE.

They are offering a strictly local programme at the Players during the month of February—plays, players, and production. As such, the offering is a very meritorious one, for the talent employed is not only local, but is confined to members of the Players Club.

Two plays are on the programme, "Fourteen" having been withdrawn after the opening night on account of the illness of Ann O'Day, who played the leading part. But these plays are of such a length as to fill up the scheduled time for an evening's programme, besides offering some novelty in theme and treatment.

The first one, "Charles the Simple," is historical tragedy, the theme centering around the hapless destiny of that Charles, known as the Simple, who, although descended from the imperial Charlemagne, knew not how to protect his own rights in an age when the nobles were merely picturesque bandits.

The plays is in two acts—or scenes, as they are called, evidently because the drama is only of half length—the first showing Charles, his little daughter, Gisele, and her friend, Yvonne, in comparative peace and happiness at Charles' palace at Compiègne; the second at the palace of the Archbishop of Rouen, where have just been celebrated the rites of the hapless little princess' marriage to Rolf, the dissolute chief of the victorious freebooters known as the Northmen, who were, at that era, overrunning and seizing the territories of the Latins.

Mr. Benjamin A. Furrington, the author of the play, has accomplished his aim of evoking the atmosphere of historical drama. The fourteen-year-old Gisele—played on a fairly successful note of pathos by Dorothy Woodworth, who looked like a fairy-tale little blue and gold princess of mediæval legends—is but a pawn in the game played by those bold freebooters. None grieves over the fate of the poor little motherless bird reft from its home nest except her father and her friend Yvonne. Charles, who is made of too weak and compliant material for a king of those times, could but suffer and yield. The little princess, however, is victorious in the end, for a kindly Providence is invoked to snatch her by death from the clutches of the brutal and dissolute bridegroom; the sympathetic relief felt by the spectator showing that the playwright has succeeded in his aim of causing us to regard the tender Gisele's impending fate as too intolerable to be borne. Our sympathies also, are aroused for Charles.

Yvonne, the lovely, dark, and adventurous maiden of the court, who is offered as a contrast to the tender, gold-haired Gisele, is portrayed with picturesqueness, and even a touch of subtlety, by Kathleen Olds Rucker. Charles himself is well played by the author, who, in mien and tone, conveys the intrinsic weakness of a gentle and amiable being who was made for a simpler destiny. Harold Weule's fine physique, commanding presence, and big voice were the principal features of his portrayal—his speech, however, showing some curdiness—and Thomas O'Toole, although rather buried beneath a devilish make-up, made himself properly odious as Rolf the Norseman. Percy McGuire, a mere youth, spoke and looked well as Sigurd the Northman, he and Kathleen Rucker between them tackling successfully the always difficult task of rendering a poetically expressed love scene. Carl Kroenke was the conventional churchman of historical drama, and a dozen others were necessary to serve as the loud-voiced Norsemen and the priests and ladies at Charles' court.

The second play, "The Exiles," by Dan Totheroh, is a melodrama of the South Seas. The author has striven to create an atmosphere of languorous and boding melancholy in the first scene—or act, really—his success not being complete, partly because the act is unduly prolonged. The scene between Laela, a subsidiary character, and Merton requires abbreviation. The principal event in this act is the abduction of Soovaloa, "a princess of a lost race" who loves and succors Merton, an alcoholic beachcomber who is too prominent for one who is so much of a weakling as to fail to win our sympathies; for Merton is made emotional, self-centered, and feebly violent.

Thus our somewhat baffled interest is thrown to the second act, where we meet

Madame, a mature but still seductive Frenchwoman who conducts a café in Hoio. Madame is something of a creation. She has redder blood than the rather conventionally outlined group in the first act. She is represented by Mabel Gump as a mature but handsome siren who moulds men to minister to her cupidity. Madame has three passions: Napoleon, Paris, and money. She has entered into a partnership with Pierre, a darkly scheming bird of prey, to steal the beautiful island girl Soovaloa and take her to Paris, there to earn much money by exploiting her as a dancer. In this second act is centered all the real dramatic interest of the play. There is much scheming, "double crossing," and crime, as the result of which virtue remains triumphant and the master criminal wins the spoils.

It has been suggested that the first act be eliminated altogether, and although such a heroic remedy is always hard on an author, it strikes me that the idea of tightening up the interest and intensifying the general dramatic effect is a good one. A play of this kind, in which the leading characters are a thoroughly bad lot, would be better reduced to a condition of rapid movement and white-hot intensity. Then we would sit up in our seats, instead of relaxing into accord with the rather slow tempo of Pierre's elaborate scheming, Madame's vampiring, and Henri's death. The playlet has too many possibilities, with its picturesque South Sea setting, its lovely native princess, and that pair of dark plotters Madame and Pierre, to let stand with its present faults. Besides, if it were reduced to one act, the author could make his characters less like echoing conventional types and more individualistic.

The sailor boys' scene went well, and suggests that the talk of the planters needs a touch of humor expressed in more vigorous vernacular.

Yes, with that central character of Madame placed in contrast to the gentle Soovaloa—although the island girl at present is rather too bright and good—with the pantherishness of Pierre heightened, and with Henri perhaps eliminated and his hesitatingly murderous intentions assumed by Madame, all those potentialities in the playlet could be greatly intensified. It might then have in its more economical form—for economy of dramatic materials counts greatly—possibilities of a career through the numerous "little theatres" scattered over the country; its picturesque locale and the character of Madame, which would draw the attention of skilled but mature actresses, constituting attractive elements.

The Players' scenic artists, who had with simple but tasteful accessories contrived several beautiful stage pictures for "Charles the Simple," also evolved a couple of good sets for "The Exiles." A cast of a dozen players was necessary for presenting the play, several of them appearing in the picturesque native pareu, which drapes the torso gracefully, but leaves the dusk limbs uncovered.

Miss Katherine Edson was strikingly successful in her physical depiction of Laela, the handsome native girl, J. D. Hamilton also serving, in the costume of the native boy, as a picturesque accessory in the first act. Only extreme personal fascination conveyed by a finished actor could win our sympathy for the weakling Merton, and the task set was too difficult for Mr. Leo Cunningham to accomplish, although his impersonation was not without merit. The character of Soovaloa, although it needs the lightening of some amusing touches of a native's artlessness and unworldliness, was very prettily conveyed by Kathleen Olds Rucker.

In the second act comes the opportunity of Mabel Gump, who showed us Madame as a sort of purring tiger cat sheathing her ruthless claws under artful cajolery. Mrs. Gump, in speech, look, and tone, made Madame a thorough Frenchwoman. She gave admirably the French accent required throughout for the rôle, and successfully expressed the consciencelessness of an evil woman to whom men are but flies in a spider's net. But the wickedness of Madame, like Soovaloa's goodness, needed some mitigation, which would have helped the player to make the character in better accord with our more complex humanity.

Mr. Ernest Clewe, in the more superficial aspects, was successful in representing Pierre. But he did not succeed in sufficiently conveying a sense of the deadly menace that lay in the man's ruthlessness. A minor fault was his lack of distinctness in the more exciting scenes.

Mr. Dan Totheroh, the author, successfully expressed, in his impersonation of Henri, the native boy, who was nerved up by the charms of Madame to the point of committing crime for her sake, the weakness, wistfulness, and innate submissiveness of a gentle weakling; and four young players as patrons of Madame's establishment completed the cast.

I have rather particularized in judging these two plays because they are native products. They are both rather awkward in length, unless they should travel together. In the beginning of "Charles the Simple" the thread of interest does not at once become taut. But when it once loses slackness the spectator's sympathies remain captured. In "Exiles" the sympathies do not have sufficient exercise. Soovaloa's is the only sympathy-engaging figure. But we generally enjoy a dramatic glimpse into the dark mental processes of congenital criminals, and once Mr. Totheroh has hewn off superfluities and speeded up his tempo—and his work warrants the trouble—his play should carry out interest along at a well-stimulated pitch by the intensity of its more concentrated and less elaborated drama.

As to the diction of the two plays: It is always difficult for the playwrights who are comparative beginners at their task to express themselves unbookishly. Hence it might be much easier to write of personages who lived in the past. Mr. Totheroh's task, therefore, is the harder. If he changes his play any a simpler colloquial tone might be advisable. And neither of the two writers showed ability to capture unswerving interest immediately. That is something that requires experience; the art, I mean, of plunging the interest of the spectators immediately into a dramatic imbroglio and inspiring them with a keen desire to see it through.

There is another possibility for "The Exiles," which, on account of the ability of the play in its present form to excite attention and remark—for this week's houses are all but sold out, I hear—might be well worth considering. It might be expanded successfully into a full length play. This would give Mr. Totheroh a still greater opportunity to make his type characters more simply human and to simplify his dramatic action by giving it more room and space in which to move freely.

And there is always the character of Madame. She seems to be needed to stiffen up the interest, as the earlier act without her presence lacked the dramatic value of the second one. And, to recur to a possibility previously pointed out, a play containing a fat rôle for a mature Circe would be sure to attract the attention of actresses in their forties looking for a play. "Les affaires sont les affaires."

a satirist, but in "Son Père," while he satirizes the selfishness of family affections, he presents a series of delightfully written scenes in which father and daughter, so long separated, and equally enchanted with the new and novel relationship, make paternal and filial love to each other; which scenes are really the real reason why A. E. Thomas, the author of "The Rainbow," perceived the possibilities of borrowing the situation from the French piece and adapting it for a play written to the taste of the American public.

"The Rainbow," therefore, is considerably altered in the spirit with which the story is presented. The author has written the play for sentimentalists, but he has given it a smart tone, plenty of persiflage in the dialogue, and rather too much gushiness in the tender scenes between father and daughter. Nevertheless the general effect is very happy. If I remember aright this play was the vehicle in which Ruth Chatterton rode to her first victory in the capture of the favor of American theatre-goers. After that season was over, the perspicacious Mr. Miller, quick to perceive the possibilities in Ruth Chatterton's future career, gave her the leading rôle in "Come Out of the Kitchen."

The rôle of Cynthia suited her girlishness well. Girlishness is Miss Chatterton's strong card. In the present case Dorothy Wetmore, on account of her youthful appearance and, probably, because she is evidently a dependable and conscientious worker, was chosen for the rôle of Cynthia, Miss Penman being cast as the beautiful, slightly faded, and rather die-away wife, who has lived the hitherto of young Cynthia's life apart from her husband. In dress, general appearance, and in the externals of her action Miss Wetmore did commendable work, her lack being an inability to express a youthful joyousness of nature, either by look or tone.

Miss Penman, although, perhaps, a shade too lackadaisical as the wife, was correct in her conception that a wife who loved her husband and left him for a couple of decades without a genuine reason must have had rather a watery fluid in her veins. Miss Penman, by the way, showed admirable judgment in her get-up for the wife, when she made her re-appearance in Neil's drawing-room.

Martha Bayes made an agreeable impression as Betsy, but it was quite impossible to consider Hélène Marchand as a lady of somewhat soiled reputation; for when she made her evening call on Neil Sumner, with men gambling in the adjoining room, I found myself involuntarily classifying her as the thoroughly respectable wife of some friend of Neil's, who has come on an errand of perfect propriety.

The plays opens on a very male atmosphere, and the three men—Messrs. Maitland, Cunningham, and Guilbert—gave the ensuing scene a satisfying tone of worldly ease.

Mr. Maitland plays the father, Neil Sumner, as he should be played; the hero of a young girl's dream. Him the author has decorated with every grace save perfect propriety of life. He is handsome, witty, genial, generous; even self-sacrificing. So tenderly does the author linger over his portrait that he even can not resist making him figure as a hero of bravery in some military adventure in—South America, wasn't it?

Thus Neil returns, after an interval of time following the second severance of the loving father and daughter, to the family group crowned with bays. Evidently A. E. Thomas is a sentimentalist of the first water.

Well, anyway, we quite enjoy the play, even if a discriminating judgment decrees that the fooling of the father and daughter over the story Cynthia reads aloud is rather silly; even if we can not but realize that in real life people on the most affectionate terms would not embrace each other quite so often as Neil and his daughter, and "dear" each other quite so numerous as Ruth and Betsy.

But the fact remains that these faults do not spoil a sympathetic play; that we have a pleasant thrill when Neil and his daughter first embrace, that we like Neil as much as the author wishes we should, and that it is a goodly sight to see an estranged husband and wife—when they really love each other—become reconciled through the drawing power of the affection of a child who loves them both so much that she can not bear to give up either.

The Columbia Theatre.

When Albert de Courville's "London Follies" appear at the Columbia this Sunday evening local playgoers will have the unusual opportunity of seeing a real metropolitan production before it reaches Broadway. It was intended that this company open in New York this month, after a tour of Canada, but at the last moment Mr. de Courville was forced by a sudden switch in bookings in London to bring over his "Pins and Needles" company to fill the New York engagement and route "The London Follies" in the Western states until such time as there is an opening on "The Great White Way."

"The London Follies" company is composed of some seventy-odd people, and is headed by the world-famous Harry Tate, who is now appearing for the first time in this country outside of New York and Boston, although some of his acts, notably "Motoring" and "Fishing," have been seen on the Orpheum Circuit. In "The London Follies" Mr. Tate will be seen in his latest creations, "Selling the Car" and "Golfing."

The revue is in fifteen scenes and was produced under the personal direction of Mr. de Courville, who is known in theatrical circles as "the Ziegfeld of London." Each scene is a distinct novelty, while the costumes, scenery, and effects are as gorgeous as the best artists of London and Paris can produce.

Numbered among the company are Lillian Coles, Connie Browning, Isobelle Dorothy, Marie Dayne, Mollie Molteno, Deane Tribune, Billy Holland, W. Wania, Henri Rosen, H. A. Kennedy, Harry Beasley, Ronald Hutchinson, Twedley and Lem Nense, all of whom are London favorites, while the chorus is composed of the pick of London's most famous beauties.

The Maitland Playhouse.

"The Lucky One," another of the delightfully clean-cut comedies by A. A. Milne, author of "Mr. Pim Passes By" and "Belinda," opens next Monday night at the Maitland Playhouse, and will provide a change in performances that have been running more to the serious side of the drama.

"The Lucky One" has never been given in San Francisco, but the Milne plays are well known and thoroughly enjoyable. The popularity of the author is attested by the fact that two of his plays are at present running in New York City. Those who have seen "The Lucky One" on Eastern stages stamp it as one of the best Milne plays and the première in this city will afford an opportunity that patrons of the theatre have long desired.

A. E. Thomas' charming comedy-drama, "The Rainbow," is the bill for the remainder of this week and the performances have received many flattering notices. It was in this play that Henry Miller raised Ruth Chatterton to stardom. "The Rainbow" closes with the Saturday night performance.

The Orpheum.

Dave Harris is "Syncopeation's Best Bet." He sings and plays innumerable instruments and plays them well. This year he brings with him seven young fellows who help make up the best syncopated act ever heard at the Orpheum. Do the public like jazz? Wait until they hear Dave Harris' band.

"A Dress Rehearsal," co-headlining next week, is described as a humorous travesty that pokes fun at the principals of the modern thriller: the author, the vampire, the heroine, and the hero. The piece is replete in clever situations and bright dialogue, all, of course, exaggerated so that a dozen laughs replace every thrill.

Ben Bernie used to be an eccentric violinist. One day in the middle of his performance his eccentricities reached a violent stage, and he broke his fiddle. In order to conclude his performance he had to rely upon his gift of gab, and it was then that Bernie discovered that the real feat of his humor was not in his violin, but in himself. Bernie ceased being an eccentric fiddler and became an eccentric comedian. He is now appearing in "This Is Not a Movie."

Ward Brothers are two comedians who assume the "silly ass" type of character. The nature of their specialty is probably best explained by the names of the characters they portray—"Bertie" and "Archie"—in "Penny Ante."

Bobby Adams and Jewel Barnett offer some songs at the piano. These are presented with little verbal sidelights of the humorous kind and are labeled "Personality Plus."

Mr. Emil Pallenberg presents three trained bears, who start where most acts leave off. One of the bears is a genuine American black bear, who has been successfully taught to walk on stilts, and is the only bear in the world to do this; the second one is a grizzly and is an expert on roller skates, and does what no other bear has been trained to do before—walk on a tight rope. The third one is a husky 450-pound Russian bear and the most accomplished bear actor in the world; he rides a two-wheeled bicycle just as securely as a man.

Speed is the foundation upon which Emilie and John Nathane have erected an athletic programme which is described as "Feats of Daring Artistically Executed." These two men work in evening dress and do the most astounding gymnastic stunts without even ruffling a shirt bosom.

The Four Marx Brothers will play another week.

The Players Theatre.

Opening on Friday evening, February 3d, and playing thereafter every Friday and Saturday evening in February, the Players Theatre announces a most unusual and interesting bill of three short plays—"Charles the Simple," by Benjamin Purrington; "Exiles," by Dan Totheroh, and "Fourteen," by Alice Gerstenberg.

"Charles the Simple" and "Exiles" are new plays by San Francisco authors which will be given their first production on any stage at the Players. They were announced at length last week.

Variety will be introduced into the bill by a bright little modern comedy between the two more serious plays. This will be "Fourteen," by Alice Gerstenberg, dealing with the tribulations of a fashionable hostess whose dinner guests regret at the eleventh hour. The part of the hostess will be played by Ann O'Day, who has been a favorite with San Francisco audiences on the professional stage and who is now making her first appearance at the Players. Nettie Ballen will take the part of Elaine, her débutante daughter, and Clarence Colman that of the butler.

The three plays are produced under the direction of Frank Darien, who so successfully directed the recent production of "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" at the Players. Special settings have been designed by Gerstle Mack, Selma Werner, and Idwal Jones.

David Warfield.

David Warfield, under the direction of David Belasco, will appear at the Columbia Theatre on Monday, February 20th, for an engagement of two weeks in "The Return of Peter Grimm," which was revived last season for the first time since its original production in 1911 and its two subsequent tours. The company surrounding the star includes several players who took part in the first production—notable among them being Marie Bates, Joseph Brennan, John Sainpolis, Marie Reichardt, John F. Webber, and William Boag—and the other members of the cast include Miriam Doyle, George Wellington, Richard Dupont, and David Malcom.

Dramatic Reading.

The dramatic interpretations of Miss Dorothea Spinney, the noted interpreter of the Greek dramatists and Robert Browning, are now fixed for February 15th, when she will give the "Alcestis" of Euripides at 3 p. m.; for February 22d, when she will read Shakespeare's "Hamlet" at 3 p. m., and February 24th, when she will read the tragedy of "Medea" at 3 p. m.; all three representations to be given at the Maitland Theatre.

Ku Klux Klan is derived from the Greek kuklōx, a circle, the "klan" being added to increase the alliterative force of the name.

The San Francisco Museum of Art.

In cooperation with the Japan Society of America, the San Francisco Museum of Art will open in the Palace of Fine Arts on Friday afternoon, February 24th, with a private view and reception. The exhibition of modern Japanese paintings is by members of Nippon Bijutsu-in of Tokyo, a group of Japan's foremost artists working traditional classic style, who have banded together to conserve and develop the national art of Japan. This is the first exhibition of this group to be shown outside of Japan, and San Francisco will be the only point west of Cleveland fortunate enough to see this remarkable collection.

The reception will be in charge of a committee, including several notable Japanese now sojourning in California, following their return from the Arms Conference.

At this time there will also be placed on exhibition a fine collection of seventeenth-century Japanese screens and other seventeenth-century art, together with a choice collection of Japanese sword guards. It has also been arranged to hold the first exhibition of Japanese flower arrangement ever held in San Francisco by accomplished masters of this art, which will further illustrate the spirit of Japan's ancient culture. To complete the artistic importance of the occasion it has been arranged to have a programme of classic Japanese music rendered on the ancient instruments by a group of their foremost musicians. Admission will be by card only.

A series of six lectures will be given at 2 o'clock on successive Friday afternoons covering the following subjects in the order named: March 3d—"The Art and Symbolism of Flower Arrangement."

March 10th—"Priest Robes and Other Japanese Textiles in Miss Mabury's Collection."

March 17th—"The Japanese Prints in Miss Mabury's Collection."

March 24th—"The Tsuba in Miss Merri-man's Collection."

March 31st—"Screens and Diverse Ancient Japanese Art in the Museum."

April 7th—"The Modern Paintings by Members of Nippon Bijutsu-in."

Course tickets for these six lectures may be obtained at the museum at $1; single lectures, 25 cents.

Museum members will be admitted free, as usual, to these lectures upon presentation of membership cards.

The exhibition will open to the public on Saturday, February 25th, and will continue for a period of six weeks.

Margot Asquith's readers, admirers, and denouncers are united at present in that they are all agog to see and hear as much of the lady as possible. Margot's visit to our inquisitive country has so far been one interview after another. But that is of course what Margot wants, publicity and then some more publicity. Her first reading before an American audience was staged January 31st at the New Amsterdam Theatre. "Such is her fame," says the New York Herald, "that the theatre, one of the city's largest, was full. Back of the orchestra rail persons were standing." To quote further from the Herald:

"Dr. Butler's introduction was kindly and graceful. He said it had been Mrs. Asquith's fortune to touch the life of England at every interesting point. He told why she would remain seated; after her ten days at sea the theatre seemed to be rising and falling. Mrs. Asquith, who had been scanning with bright, eager eyes the lines of the theatre and the faces of the Americans, confessed herself touched by the reception. 'You even clap me before you hear me,' she said as she arose. She was reminded of Thackeray's accosting a man whom he had caricatured and asking him how he liked his lecture on 'The Four Georges.' The man replied: 'We rather missed the music in the slow parts.'"

"I'm not an orator," she added. "I've got a husband and a stepdaughter and a daughter who speak, but I do not." So she sat down again and began to read."

The reading was from an unpublished second volume of her autobiography, "My Last Adventure in the Sporting World," Margot called it. Alas! The crowds that pressed the house to the S. R. O. point had not turned out to hear of a "sporting adventure" in the British sense. The adventure disappointingly turned out to be Mrs. Asquith's trial of a new horse, a hunter named Dandelion. When the disappointed audience discovered that in England sport means sport, there was something awfully like a scene. Long before the climax was reached one of the protesting women in the top balcony made her decision. Her words were penetrating enough for all to hear, as, in the midst of Mrs. Asquith's animated reading, she shouted:

"Well, good-by. You've got our money for nothing. Good-by."

One instant Mrs. Asquith paused. A glance at the balcony told her that the woman was up and departing. Then she returned to her manuscript, picked up the narrative at the precise word where the interruption had found her, and continued to read. Hisses sputtered in all parts of the theatre, including the balconies, then stopped as Mrs. Asquith, to all appearances undisturbed by this episode, went on with her task.

However, Margot's disappointed interrupter left too soon. For Mrs. Asquith had given her duller narrative first. She had saved the best for the last. Though it was not royalty she was exposing, but American rudeness. Says the Herald:

"Her account of her ride on Dandelion, crowded with dialect which only a few persons found intelligible, did not 'get over.' Those who had counted on the showing up of a few kings and queens seemed to feel cheated when they found that she was only exposing a horse. The story of the American actress went much better. It was packed with such lines as this:

"Whatever the war accounted for other people, ours did not make us good."

"On the train to London in 1917 'a fine lady poking about in a jeweled handbag' proved to be an American actress. Mrs. Asquith told her she might have guessed by her clothes that she was an American. The actress said such things as 'Oh, believe me, this man Asquith is enormously rich and sympathizes with Germany, and his daughter Elizabeth is engaged to be married to a German admiral. But he's not to blame; it's his wife; she must be a terrible woman. Everybody knows Mrs. Asquith, for she's so ugly.'"

"In America that may be regarded as an achievement; here it is regarded as a misfortune," said Margot to the actress. "They say she's so hard she can't feel the war at all," said the actress. "It's common knowledge she's so hard she would get anybody to do her dirty work for her." Eventually the actress "lapsed into silence." Mrs. Asquith took her in her own taxicab at Paddington station. When she told the actress who she was the American was awfully contrite and called her "Honey."

"So you are Mrs. Asquith?" she said. "I thought you were homely and overwhelming." "Don't worry; I am both," said Mrs. Asquith."

Margot was a bit hazy about the identity of her "American actress." She thought her candid interlocutor was a celebrity in America. She said to the audience, "You all know her." She reached her climax with the name of the actress. It was Ida Adams, she said. There is an Ida Adams who figured to some extent in chorus and later as a dancing star in London a few years ago, but the mention of her name left her audience cold, very cold. One could not help wondering if Mrs. Asquith, who confessedly knows little of America, had confused the name of the stranger she met on the train with that of Maude Adams.

The above was the only near spicy anecdote of the reading—which goes to prove that it pays to advertise. However, Margot was wise enough to give her audience what they so palpably wanted—some royal gossip. She described the visit of the Asquiths to Windsor Castle in 1908. One of those present was Sir Edward Grey, "for whom," the autobiographer continued, "I have a deep affection; there is something lonely, lofty, and even pathetic about him." She dropped this hint for nice people: "If you do not keep a grip on yourselves on the rare occasions when you are with the rich and great, you notice little and enjoy nothing."

But what the crowd wanted was royalty, so Margot gave it to them. The motors were all in line, ready to take the royal party somewhere. But Prime Minister Asquith was missing.

"The king was very angry," read Margot. "Where is the prime minister?" he said. "Didn't he get my command?" I went up to the queen and said, 'I fear there must have been some scandal in the court and my husband has eloped with one of the maids of honor. I beg of you to pity my blushes and command the king to proceed.' So the queen tapped the king on the shoulder and with a sweeping gesture pointed to the motor and invited him to ride with her, and they drove off. Later it was ascertained that my husband had been walking with the queen's loveliest maid of honor, upon hearing which the king was most jovial and even eloquent."

The crowd was satisfied. The writer in the Herald, who had evidently caught some of Mrs. Asquith's vivacious and trenchant English, says: "Two large bouquets of roses were thrust at her. . . . Photographers blazed at her back of the stage. They wanted her to look at the camera. 'No,' she said, 'I'm too old a hand for that. Go ahead and stop bothering about which way I look.'"

The reading ended more successfully than it began. Those who lingered had the additional satisfaction of hearing Mrs. Asquith shout at a group of celebrities in the audience: "Could you understand me? Well, if you couldn't, I assure you you didn't miss anything."

Simultaneously with the news that E. Phillips Oppenheim will arrive in New York February 13th for his first visit here in ten years, his publishers, Little, Brown & Co., announce that they will publish in March a new novel by this popular English author. The title is "The Great Prince Shan," and it will be a story of world politics in 1934 that is said to possess the same interest that characterized his earlier famous novels of international intrigue.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

"Women are vain," said Viscount Bryce at a Williams College tea. "You can't get on with them unless you bear their vanity continually in mind. I know a preacher who called on a widow to console her on the death of her husband. 'Yes,' she said, 'it's sad, it's very sad, madam, but you must remember that Jim is far, far happier where he is now.' The widow burst into angry tears. 'How very rude of you to say that!' she sobbed."

At Southern railway stations it is the custom of darkies to sell chicken patties and other delicacies to passengers. A passenger who had enjoyed a patty and was leaning out of the window to buy another, asked of the dusky salesman: "Where do you get your chicken?" The darky rolled his eyes. "You-all f'om de No'th, aint you, sah?" he queried. "Yes," was the reply. "But why do you ask that?" "Case, sah! No gen'l'm'n f'om de South eber asks a nigger whar he gits his chicken."

A young man from Los Angeles was paying a visit to a cousin in San Francisco who is very "strong" for the new movement in art, and who took him to visit a futurist art exhibition. The Los Angeles youth remained quiet during the view. "Well," said the cousin at last, "you don't seem to be particularly enthusiastic about the pictures. What do you think of them?" "Think!" exclaimed the youth from Los Angeles. "Why, man, I've got two aunts in Glendale that can knit better pictures than these."

A mission worker says that, while waiting for the occupant of the first floor tenement house to admit him, he chanced to overhear two women conversing on the stairs. One remarked that her husband always wore a clean shirt every Sunday morning. "Well, now," responded the other. "I never cares much about Sunday, but I always sees that my man has a clean shirt Saturday afternoons, because that's the time he's generally fightin', and when he takes his coat off to fight I likes to know he looks nice and clean."

At a colored camp-meeting in Louisiana the following sermon was delivered by a very black old darky, wearing huge spectacles: "Brethren and sistern, de preachifying dis mawnin' will be frum de text on de ten virgins. De bridegroom war a-comin' and 'spectin' dem ten virgins to be ready wif dere lamps all trimmed and a-burnin', but, lo, when he was come he done foun' dat on'y five of dem virgins war ready; yes sir, five was trimmed and five was ontrimmed; five was wise and five was onwise; five was ready and five was onready; five was male and five was female."

Hiking through the small French town an ignorant chicken, unversed in the appetites of American darkies, crossed the road in front of a colored detachment. With much zeal a soldier broke forth from the ranks and set out in pursuit. "Halt!" bellowed the officer in charge. Both fowl and negro only accelerated their paces. "Halt! Halt!" repeated the officer. The dusky doughboy made one plunge, grasped the chicken by the neck, and stuffed it, still struggling, inside his shirt. "Here!" he panted. "Ah'll learn you to halt when de captain says halt, yo' dis'bedient bird."

The colonel believed in soldiers being bachelors, so he usually refused his men permission to marry. One applicant turned away looking so downcast that even the officer's stern heart was touched. "Look here, my man," he said, "come to me again in a year's time, and if you still want to be married I'll give my consent." The year passed. Again the private applied; the colonel was quite taken aback. "Well, well, I really must give you permission," he smiled. "I never expected to find such constancy in either man or woman." The private saluted. "Thank you, sir," he said gratefully. "B-but, please, sir, it aint the same woman!"

The leading negroes of a Georgia town started a bank and invited persons of their race to become depositors. One day a darky, with shoes run down at the heels, a gallus over one shoulder, and a cotton shirt, showed up at the cashier's window. "See here," he said, "I want mah ten dollars." "Who is yuh?" asked the cashier. "Mah name is Jim Johnson, an' I wants dat ten dollars." "Yuh aint go' no money in dis here bank," said the cashier, after looking over the books. "Yes, I has," insisted the visitor. "I put ten dollars in here six mont's er go." "Why, man, yuh sure is foolish. De intrist done et dat up long er go."

Lord Northcliffe, whose recent voyage to America was delayed by fog, told a fog story at a dinner in New York. "Of course," he began, "you've heard the fog story about the fog which was so thick that the boys sat on the fences and heaved fog balls at the passers-by? I gave a prize of a guinea for that story when I started Answers, my penny weekly, in my youth. But another fog story that won an Answers prize of three guineas was about a London merchant who received one foggy morning a telephone message from his clerk. 'I'm sorry, sir,' the clerk said, 'but I can't come down to the office this morning on account of the fog. I have not yet arrived home yesterday.'"

Sir Auckland Geddes said at a dinner in Dark Harbor: "Little nations sometimes exercise a certain pardonable duplicity in getting favors from big nations. This may be wrong, but it is certainly politic. Little nations can't use force, you know. In the Mile End Road one evening a little fellow began to bawl and scream. 'Oh, me farden! I've lost me brite farden!' A group of young costers were loafing nearby, and one of them said: 'Ere, mates, let's 'elp this pore kid find 'is farden.' So, in the goodness of their hearts, they all began to search laboriously, while the urchin continued to bawl: 'Oh, me farden! Me brite farden!' In a minute or two one of the costers found the lost coin. 'Ere's yer farden, kid,' he said, and then a ray from the street lamp fell on it and he yelled: 'W'y, it aint a farden at all. It's 'arf a quid!' 'Garn!' said the boy, as he snatched his money. 'Think I was goin' to let you blokes know it was a ten-shilling piece? Why, one o' ye would 'a 'ad 'is foot on it afore I'd time ter turn round.' And he ran off with his valuable 'farden' like a streak of lightning."

Low-heeled, unsteeled (so eugenic)
Unique, phys-ique realsthenic)
Tennis: rules a horse, well you know—
(See that tapestry of June!)
Swims a stroke that fairly sizzles,
Looks on clinging vines as fizzes;
Flat-hipped, red-hipped, laughter mellow
Guileless, witless, splendid fellow,
Swings a nasty niblick, take it
From Your's Truly—she can make it
In the Nineties—ask the laddie
Who is her devoted caddie;
Ripping, gripping "you-know-me" stuff,
Jolly—Polly calls any bluff.
Always steps along at Fifty
In her little speedster, nifty,
Traffic coppers smile, and let her,
Never even try to get her.

Does she ignite Hymen's torches?
Nay! She isn't there on porches.

The Barber Turns Critic.

Thomas Hardy's barber recently confided to F. Hadland Davis that in his opinion the novelist is sadly overrated. His comments, as reported by Mr. Davis to the Bookman's Gossip Shop for February, follow:
"Such a quiet little man. You'd never know it was Thomas Hardy. Such an old overcoat, and such a baggy umbrella! . . . He used to talk to me about London as it was years ago when cock-fighting was all the rage. . . . Never read his books—and never want to. . . .
"Americans seem to think a lot of him."

One came in here not long ago
'Seen Thomas Hardy?'
"Oh, yes!" I says. 'He sat in the chair you're sitting in.'
"In this chair?" shouts the American, no end excited.
"Yes," I says. 'I cut Mr. Hardy's hair.'
"Did you keep the hair you cut off?" asks the customer, putting his hand in his pocket.
"No," says I, 'I didn't.'
"Well, that's a pity," replies the Yankee;
'because if you had I'd have bought it!'"

The Philadelphia Public Ledger has received the following communication: "Upon October 3d the Philadelphia Public Ledger stated that the famous Exeter beer cellars have been abolished, with the consent of the undergraduates, and substituted by 'a lunch-room where nothing stronger than tea or coffee will be served.' I am instructed by a unanimous vote of the Stapledon, or college society, utterly to deny this rumor and beg you to give prominence to the fact that the Exeter College beer cellars have been renovated, not abolished, and that they are still as satisfying and popular as ever. I have the honor to be your obedient servant, Neville K. Coghill, honorable secretary Exeter College, Stapledon Society, Oxford."

The Housewives' League of Berlin has petitioned the city council to levy a tax of 1000 marks a person on foreigners who remain in Berlin more than five days. A heavy luxury tax also is requested on eating and drinking, particularly with reference to those places where persons are charged as much as 1000 marks for a bottle of French champagne:

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

Cycol will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of Cycol as shown on the Cycol Recommendation Chart. Use Associated gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

Portugal's Best Journal.

For various reasons—among them lack of knowledge, perhaps—one does not expect to find in Portugal any very remarkable manifestations of journalistic enterprise or achievement (says the New York Times). It is, therefore, with a feeling of some surprise that one looks over the pages issued as a Christmas number by O Seculo, which is published in Lisbon. It claims to be the largest and most influential newspaper in its country, and if its claim is not well based the others have a right to be proud, for O Seculo is evidently a well-conducted paper, and, judging from the number and quality of the advertisements in this special production of its presses, it has the prosperity its merits deserve.

The illustrations, some of them in multiple color, are many, and they are commendable, even notable, as specimens of the typographic art. Through the dimming veil of language it can be seen that the articles in O Seculo are well written and that their appeal is to the intelligence of its readers, not to a love of the sensational. Evidently the leading journal in the Portuguese capital is not "yellow." It prefers to have dignity and a regard for the proprieties as well as the verities.

The pages of this Christmas number are only twenty—which is not many, according to American standards of today—but it is obvious that they would be read with edification if one could catch more than a sentence here

The use of the fleur de lis as a symbol of royalty in France can not be traced further back than the twelfth century, and it is probably not of French origin. It is said to occur in headdresses of Egyptian sphinxes and the symbol was early an ornament of Greek, Roman, Spanish, and English kings.

Putting up a Memorial, whether it is a simple Tablet or an elaborate Mausoleum, brings forth a multitude of queries—as to materials of worth and their producers. It is much the same as investing in a fine watch or mechanism. It can not be taken apart for critical examination. The thing to look for, then, is the reputation of the maker, his reliability and that of his product.

Original Raymond Granite is different in that it has more desirable features than any other material for permanent Memorials.

Our Next International Adventure.

While there have been no announcements, and in so far as we know no public discussions with reference to our next adventure in the field of foreign relations, there are reasons to suspect that the Administration may soon turn its attention to Latin-American affairs. We may not immediately have a pan-American conference on the lines of the Pacific and Far Eastern Conference which has just been brought to a successful conclusion, but something of the sort is bound to come sooner or later—probably before the end of the year. The Mexican situation contains many suggestions of trouble. Something is brewing there, though just what nobody outside of the inner circle at Washington knows. Nicaragua is making appeal in various forms for withdrawal of our marines from where for ten years past their presence has been the main factor in preserving the stability of the existing government. Beyond the Isthmus there are several disturbing questions. The United States of Colombia will hold an election next month, and there is likelihood that new international complications will be projected into public view. Japan has been flirting with Colombia precisely as she has been flirting with Mexico in relation to colonization schemes. Thus, while the larger world has been busy with post-war problems, a whole brood of new complications has developed on our own continent. Success of the conference system in matters of naval disarmament as to Pacific Ocean interests is likely to incline the Washington Administration to apply similar treatment to the issues of Mexico and of Central and South America. The Argonaut ventures to prophesy that before the end of the year we shall have another international conference on hand, one dealing exclusively with affairs of the American continent.

The Pace That Destroyed Rome.

President and Congress are sweating blood in the matter of the bonus. They are getting no more than what is fairly coming to them. It is due to themselves—to President and to Congress—that there has grown up an issue, and a mightily vexatious one, upon no equity, no basis of obligation. If the truth be told, it was not the ex-soldiers who originally raised this cry for the bonus. It was the politicians. Conceived as an expedient of small politics, it has become a social, political, and economic menace. President Harding might have stopped it six months ago by a straight-from-the-shoulder presentment of the moralities involved in it. His voice in bold protest would have carried wide and it would have impressed the country profoundly and effectively. By going only half-way in his protest against the first proposal he left open a door which in prudence should have been shut tight.

A movement that might easily have been checked has become a torrent. It now seems useless, excepting in retrospect, to speak of the fundamental objections to the bonus. The campaign for it has reached a stage where only what may be called "practical" considerations are timely. Like the call to "stand and deliver" on the part of the railroad brotherhoods half a dozen years ago, it has become a colossal hold-up. The shameless surrender of the Adamson Act was the answer to the brotherhoods; and it now looks as if there would be a similarly shameless surrender to the newer call to stand and deliver. Even now an Andrew Jackson or a Grover Cleveland would call a halt with a ringing "Thou shalt not!" But we hear nothing to this effect either from the President or from Congress. The whole concern of those in authority relates to the political effects and to the financial embarrassments involved. Secretary of the Treasury Mellon and Senator Nelson alone have the hardihood to speak out against the illegitimacy of this wretched business, but their voices are lost in the clamor of the vote brokers. Chairman Fordney frankly confesses his "fear of the political reprisals threatened by the professional promoters of the bonus plan among service men." He testifies to the timidity of Congress in the declaration, "You can put it down as a certainty that the bonus bill will be passed by the House of Representatives." An unnamed senator is quoted as saying: "We are between the devil and the deep sea. The ex-service men are organized and will wield a tremendous power in politics this autumn. * * * The trouble is that members of Congress have been influenced by their own political ambitions and have disregarded the economic aspects of the problem." And so it goes. It is not, as matters stand with Congress, a question of what the duty of the government is, but a question of "satisfying" the ex-soldiers to the end that they may vote for Republican congressmen this coming November.

We have likened this hold-up to that of the railroad brotherhoods some years back. In truth, it lacks even the justification of that crime. The Adamson Act was passed with the idea of protecting the country against paralysis of transportation. The prospective yielding to this newer hold-up relates not at all to the public interest. It is to be made solely in the interest of congressmen who desire to be reelected—as a bribe out of the public treasury to the ex-soldier vote. Is there anybody so blind and deaf to the facts of human nature—and of political nature—as not to know that when surrender shall have been made in the matter of the bonus it will be only the first of a series of hold-ups? It will only whet the appetite for more. Upon the heels of one successful raid upon the treasury there will come another and another, to be followed by others, until the last of the "veterans" and of those actually or theoretically dependent upon him shall be laid in their graves. As a result, for two generations to come the country will be cursed by demands backed by an element which has no moral claim and no plea other than the voting power of its numbers.

Let no Republican of whatever rank lay the flattering unction to his soul that the party will gain any advantage through this surrender. It will be remembered that the present Administration came into control of the government upon its promise to correct the abuses of the administration that preceded it, and to reduce taxes. What will be the reaction of the country when it finds that taxes, instead of being lower, are made higher? How will the party meet the charge of bad faith if the demands of the tax-gatherer, instead of being reduced, shall be advanced? In what spirit will the country respond to the multitude of vexatious exactions that will be imposed by the necessity of raising billions for the ex-soldier, not one in four of whom ever smelled gunpowder? The question answers itself. There will be annoyance, then disgust, then resentment, then revolt. Just as the party responsible for the Adamson Act first lost respect and then lost control of the government, so it will be with the party that shall weakly yield to this unreasonable and essentially immoral demand.

The notion that by some species of legerdemain—some trick of hocus-pocus—the government may pay out somewhere between two and a half and five billion dollars without its costing the taxpayer anything is too diaphanous even for camouflage. Whatever the government must pay out it must first get in. If by forms of taxation, then the pledges of the last national campaign must be dishonored. If by borrowing, then a new burden of debt must be added to the already mountainous sum of our national obligations. This phase of the matter is serious enough in all conscience; yet it is the least part of the mischief. The grievous thing is the deterioration in character that this bribe will impose upon the takers of it, and the demoralization of American politics that will be its certain product.

Governor Stephens Sharply Rebuked.

Governor Stephens' letter of last week to the State Board of Railroad Commissioners was nothing more or less than an effort to employ the prestige of the executive office in a campaign for reelection. It has met; as it deserved to meet, a rebuke due to impertinence—a rebuke all the more stinging because in terms entirely civil. With tremendous effect the commission quotes a letter addressed by the then President Roosevelt to its first chairman, the late John M. Eshleman. Roosevelt wrote:

Elected as you will be under a movement responsive to the people and independent of the corporations, you will find it easy to reduce rates where they are too high, and you will find many rates are too high. Your real task will come later, when you have to do justice to the corporations and raise rates in spite of the popular clamor to lower them. The test of public regulation will be the ability of public men to do that and to maintain popular confidence in doing it.

Proceeding, the commission justifies its course by detailed arguments of unquestioned weight. Then, in terms studiously polite, it reminds the governor that his attempt to dictate the course of the commission is a violation of the principles essential to its integrity and its usefulness. "Your letter," say the commissioners, "raises the fundamental issue of regulation, as established by the people of this state. The success of this system, as you point out, depends upon public confidence and understanding. But it equally depends upon full freedom under the law to exact justice uninfluenced by any other consideration whatsoever." Then follows this body blow:

You state that you are concerned for the preservation of regulation of public utilities. A like sense of our own responsibility for regulation impels us to reply that while regulation may be weakened by the temporary or local unpopularity of some decisions it would be destroyed by even the suspicion that decisions were affected by any consideration or influence other than the real merits involved, ascertained after full and careful consideration of all the facts. * * *

The policy that has been pursued in the past is the policy that governs the present commission. So long as we are members of this commission we will be governed by principles of equity and justice and perform our sworn duty regardless of consequences. We propose to fix fair rates—and that means fair both to the ratepayers and to the utility—upon established facts uninfluenced by feeling of favoritism.

Since some thirty years ago, when the late Governor Penoyer of Oregon reminded the President of the United States to "mind his own business," we do not recall anything in the way of an official rebuke quite so sharp as this. If Governor Stephens has any sensibilities at all he must curse the evil hour which led him so far beyond the lines of propriety as to undertake to make political capital by impertinent meddling with matters beyond the range of his knowledge or his authority. Under his authority as governor of the state he has, of course, means of reprisal. If he chooses—and has the requisite nerve—he can reorganize the Railroad Commission by putting subservient creatures in places now held by men of honorable independence and of character. Will he do it? Verily, he will not. Wrathful as he probably is, there will be limits to his indiscretion.

Hard Going for General Dawes.

In his capacity of Director of the National Budget General Dawes is finding the sledding extremely rough. His efforts to introduce common-sense business methods into the operations of the government encounter obstacles ranging along the line from rank recklessness to sheer stupidity. Here's an illustration: The Navy Department needs brooms for deck and yard use to the number of 12,000. A New York factory offered to supply them at 55 cents each. The War Department holds in its surplus stock-supply 350,000 brooms, bought at war prices and listed by the Budget Bureau at 70 cents each. The budget director suggested that instead of buying a new stock of brooms the Navy Department fill its requirements by taking over brooms from the surplus stock of the War Department. But the Navy Department declined upon the theory that it would be bad business to pay 70 cents to the War Department for an article that could be bought in the market at 55 cents. That both departments are branches of the same government and that they draw their funds from a common source made no appeal to the naval authorities.

Here we have in its finest flower the working of the bureaucratic mind. It regards the bureau as a separate and self-contained government. It can not grasp the fundamental difference between paying by book-keeping charge another branch of the government for supplies and paying a private contractor for them. It is true that if in the instance above cited the brooms had been transferred from the army surplus to the Navy Department, the Navy Department's appropriation would have been reduced by the total of the purchase price. The difference between 70 cents per broom and 55 cents would by this process have been lost to the navy fund. But the national treasury would not have paid out a single cent. To the government there would have been salvage to the extent of the purchase. On the other hand, by buying from a private contractor the Navy Department makes an apparent saving in its appropriation, although the public treasury is out that much more money. The government is in the position of buying a new set of brooms, although it has an over-abundant supply on hand.

The only money in which a department or a bureau has any interest is that appropriated for itself. It has no conception of government money as a whole. What other bureaus do, or what the condition of the national treasury may be, is not of bureau concern. Self-contained and self-sufficient, it narrows its vision down to its own special interest. All other bureaus are as far removed from it as if they belonged to another government.

It is reported that General Dawes in his lecture to bureau heads got so excited that at times he jumped clean off the floor and fairly howled in indignation. His energy in this matter, as in other aforetime instances that the public will recall, has vastly amused Washington. If it lacked something in dignity there was compensating gain in emphasis and publicity.

Even the President is reported to have been immensely pleased by Dawes' exhibition of energy. A grave senator is quoted as declaring that he had seen many orators get one foot off the ground in bursts of eloquence, but that never before had he heard of one who got both feet in the air at the same time.

More strength to General Dawes! He is doing, or at least trying to do, good work in exorcising the vices heretofore incidental to business operations as conducted on government account. That he will be able to work anything very notable in the way of reforms is to be doubted. Many have exhibited the extravagance of public dealing, but nobody has yet been able to enforce business practice. Not only the general government, but every state government, and even every municipal government, and further, every department of every municipal government, exhibits the impossibility of getting public business done under the standards of private discretion. Here is one, if not the foremost, objection to proposals of public ownership. Whenever it has been tried in matters large or small—ranging from administration of the railroads of the country to the buying of a reel of fire hose—there are margins of difference between cost of things on public account and on private account. Party platforms speak glibly of economy and of business methods. The phrases come trippingly from the tongue of politicians—even the President. But theory is one thing and practice is another. General Dawes may be able with his budget to work out some economies, but he will never get the government to conduct its business upon strictly business principles. Public business is never done that way.

Bleeding Ireland.

There is blood on the face of the moon as she looks down upon Ireland. Protestant Ulster is up in arms. The Catholic part of Ulster is putting spikes into its shillalahs. De Valera is shouting for what he styles freedom, and has the support of a considerable faction with special favor of the shrieking sisterhood of whom the wife and the sister of the more-or-less martyred late mayor of Cork are the foremost shriekers. Michael Collins, representing the faction that accepts the Dominion plan, is fighting mad toward De Valera and hardly less so toward the British government because it will not allow the fiery Southrons to kill Ulstermen at their pleasure. Altogether it is a situation that must be regarded as lovely by champions of the Irish spirit.

The only gratifying fact in the situation is the confusion that reigns among Irish sympathizers in America. They are not finding it easy to determine what is just now the Irish cause. Collins warns the true patriots of the hyphenated brood that they must not contribute to the "rebellious projects" of De Valera. De Valera cries out that there must be no support from America for Collins and others bought with British gold. The hope is that under the difficulty of knowing who's who our hyphenated fellow-citizens may keep their money where it belongs. The surest of all means for the pacification of Ireland would be to shut tight the purses of Irish sympathizers in America.

The claim that Ireland, if permitted to do so, has the ability to govern herself is now on trial. All the old bonds are off. The suffering Irish may do as they demitition please. But they are not making a good start. Aforetime there were two Irelands cordially hating each other. Now there are three. Incidentally, the British government is in a hard position. It has agreed to leave Ireland practically to her own devices. Up to now the arrangement has not worked out to please anybody—least of all the Irish. What will Britain's obligations be if the Irish factions shall address themselves to murdering each other, which now seems imminent? Verily, the question is a hard one.

The Treaties in the Senate.

The question of what the United States Senate will do in the matter of the treaties formulated by the Washington Conference, and submitted for approval last week by President Harding, is very much in the public mind. Confirmation will call for a two-thirds vote. The Republicans have a substantial majority, even without the group of "irreconcilables," of which Senator Borah is the head and front. But they have not the requisite two-thirds. If the Democrats, in resentment of the rejection of President Wilson's league of nations, should decide to oppose confirmation, they have the votes to defeat it. The situation, regarded politically, is a delicate one, with something to the good in the announcement that ex-President Wilson will take no hand in the matter.

Already the matter has been determined in the large court of public opinion. The country is for the treaties, and this being so, there is little doubt that confirmation will be both prompt and emphatic. Probably effort will be made to attach conditions to one or more of the treaties—notably the Four-Power Pact. On the other hand, President Harding's emphatic statement that "nothing in any of these treaties commits the United States or any other power to any kind of alliance, entanglement, or involvement" may be taken as an authoritative interpretation and therefore in itself of binding effect.

A consideration certain to weigh heavily with men of all parties who highly regard the world standing of the country, and who are patriotically disposed to sustain its prestige, is emphasized by the New York World, foremost of our national Democratic journals. If now, argues the World, the Senate should reject the findings of the Conference called by the United States, and which has achieved the end suggested by our government, the world will not soon again take seriously any proposal made by us in the sphere of international affairs. This is true, and it accords with President Harding's declaration that "if to these undertakings for peace the Senate will not advise and consent, then it will be futile to try again." Our national repute as well as our national interest demands confirmation of the treaties, and this being so, it is not going too far to prophesy that the Senate will ratify the work of the Conference. In no proper sense can the achievements of the Conference be regarded from a partisan standpoint. Democrats have precisely the same interest in the achievements of the Conference as have Republicans.

Editorial Notes.

There will come next month from the press of the Houghton Mifflin Company a biography of the late E. H. Harriman which for several years has been in preparation by George Kennan. It will take up the story of Mr. Harriman's life from boyhood; and those familiar with the man and his work need not be told that it will be a fascinating recital. In his second volume Mr. Kennan will treat in detail of Mr. Harriman's work in the West. An especially interesting feature of the book will be a careful setting forth of the famous incident in which Mr. Harriman and President Roosevelt were opposing figures. Here in California there will be a special interest in a work which deals intimately with a great national figure whom we like to regard as a Californian.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

A Bouquet.

DR. DONALD B. PRITCHARD
61 West Fourth Street

WINONA, MINN., February 6, 1922.
MR. ALFRED HOLMAN—Dear Sir: The Argonaut of the 4th instant has just reached me. Your first editorial is a gem. If you could only be multiplied by ten thousand and scattered throughout this land and each one of the ten thousand of you were editing a newspaper, what a wonderful thing it would be for the country. Very respectfully yours,
DONALD B. PRITCHARD.

Judge Belcher to Representative Kahn.

SAN FRANCISCO, February 14, 1922.

Hon. Julius Kahn.

Washington, D. C.—
DEAR MR. KAHN: This is on the good saint's day, but it is upon another matter: it is my encomium upon your opposition to the soldiers' bonus measure.

The soldiers' bonus measure is utterly indefensible upon any ground whatever; more especially it is objectionable upon the only ground available for it to stand upon at this time—the ground of its, supposed, political expediency, that is to say, as a gallery play for the soldier vote. The gallery will not respond as expected; the performance will end sans encore. If the measure shall pass—and become law (may all the gods that preside over the destiny of the Republican party forbend!)—then, I prophesy, the next election will witness the downfall of many a weak-kneed congressman who voted "aye" upon it.

No other emotion of man is as sublime as love of God and country!

From of old: Pro Deo et patria!
Who, then, would mock the value of virtue with money!—or of holiness, or righteous conduct!—or the fine, the dauntless courage, which—sweeping all before it—drives upon the out-thrust spears with the patriot cry: "Make way for liberty!"

Have Republican legislators, confronted by an unusual demand, become obfuscated, as though some modern Cromwell were already on the way to the House! their sense of proportion, their (sometime) fine political acumen so lost as that they are, at this time, unable to realize that a large—a very large proportion of those gallant men—returned, intact, from the welter of the war—will keenly resent any cheapening of their valor, displayed on many a field—at Cantigny, at Château-Thierry, in the Argonne?

What to them—in this time of their country's distress, when additional tax burdens are like to become as that fabled straw upon the camel's back!—what to them—these warriors of ours, but just returned from the front of the battle—this sop! this five or six hundred dollars, apiece, to be given in dribbles by fearsome congressmen lest next time they lack the soldierly vote!

Does anybody suppose that those men will not understand and despise the cowardice?

This sop to them—these patriots!—when on every hand they see misery heaped on misery, as when—

Disasters come not singly;
But as if they watched and waited,
Scanning one another's motions,
When the first descends, the others
Follow, follow, gathering flockwise
Round their victim, sick and wounded,
First a shadow, then a sorrow,
Till the air is dark with anguish!

This sop to them—these patriots!
For the disabled veterans—everything!

EDWARD A. BELCHER.

From Another Protesting Ex-Service Man.

Mr. William C. Van Antwerp, a member of Post No. 1 (San Francisco) of the American Legion has telegraphed to Washington a strong protest against the bonus programme. We excerpt the following:

It is claimed that great financial advantage accrued to those who remained in civilian occupations and that this advantage was shared by all other Americans who remained at work. Therefore what is now sought is payment in the nature of equalization for men in the armed forces, to compensate them for what they profess to have lost by not working in the shipyards, munition plants, etc.

Let us examine this matter. In the first place it is not true that men in the armed forces received only their pay at a basic rate of $30 a month. The Senate committee which reported the bill estimated that the cost per man for food, shelter, and clothing was $60 additional, or that in pay and in these necessities each man received approximately $90 a month.

In other words, the Senate committee itself estimates that the compensation thus received was equivalent to the earnings of a man outside the forces who worked twenty-six days a month at $3.46 a day. This is a rate of $1080 a year. That happens to be very little short of estimates for the average annual earnings of employees in all industries as computed by well-known economists and submitted to Congress in October, 1921, by the joint committee on agriculture.

The average earnings in all industries computed for 1918—the latest year for which these figures have been prepared—were $1094, which, as we have just seen, is only $14 a year more than our soldiers received.

But to the compensation received by men in the armed forces as outlined above are to be added other benefits, which included, not merely such incidents as medical attention and protection of their property against civil action, etc., but such substantial provisions as allowances for dependents, which aggregated $298,000,000, and assumption for men in the armed forces of the whole war cost of insurance policies aggregating thirty-nine billion dollars.

No other government made such generous provision for the men in its armed forces and those dependent upon them. Indeed, instead of receiving less than the men who remained at home, our soldiers, as all this proves, actually received more. What, then, is there to "adjust"? Why call this measure an adjusted compensation bill when actually it is nothing of the sort?

As for the men who remained at work in civilian occupations at home, it is a fact familiar to every one that the purchasing power of their compensation during the war was only half of what it was before the war. The same is true of those manufacturers and industrial leaders who seemed, but only seemed, to be making large profits. If actually there were large profits, they were subjected to the most rigorous taxation that any country ever devised, and to such an extent that today those profits are non-existent.

From these hardships of high costs and burdensome taxation the men under arms were alone immune, and in addition to that immunity the government is faithfully discharging its duty to the dead, injured, and disabled through insurance and vocational training which now costs the taxpayers $450,000,000 a year. Nor is this all. Seventeen states have already provided $250,000,000 in cash bonuses to their veterans and seven other states will shortly swell this total.

The bonus bill now before Congress offers to the veteran any one of several options other than the cash "adjustment" above described. He is thus offered a preferential right to acquire homesteads upon lands open to settlement and upon Federal reclamation projects, with his "adjusted service pay," plus 40 per cent. He is also offered his bonus plus 40 per cent. if he elects to purchase a home. He is also offered his bonus plus 40 per cent. if he chooses an approved course in vocational training.

Finally, if he decides upon the out-and-out bonus, the bill provides that payment may be deferred for twenty years, offering an inducement 40 per cent. plus 4 1/2 per cent. compound interest.

Notwithstanding the fact that many of these options are praiseworthy incentives to thrift, I am opposed to them all; first, because the men in our armed forces have already received adequate compensation; second, because no man who has enjoyed the blessed privilege of defending his home and his country should ask an honorarium for so doing; third, because the payment of bonuses demanded under this bill would place a burden upon the public, which can not be borne without highly disturbing results.

If every veteran elects to take cash, $1,547,000,000 is the amount we shall have to pay; $5,273,000,000 will be the cost if certificates are chosen. These are the estimates of the Senate committee, and every one who has had experience in such matters knows that they will actually greatly exceed that portentous total, since no account is taken of the cost of administration, which the House Committee on Ways and Means estimates at $1,500,000,000 more. Nor is this all. Once this bill become a law there will be a bonus lobby in sinister attendance at every session of Congress during this generation, demanding and receiving additional "adjustments."

We can never do enough for the dead, the sick, the wounded, and disabled, and all our efforts should be confined to them. I call upon the hearts and consciences of the ex-service men to oppose this bill and I ask all others to fight as is indefensible in principle and odious in its mercenary implications.

A Real Veteran Speaks.

Senator Nelson of Minnesota, the last veteran of the civil war in Congress, speaks a straightforward mind upon the bonus issue. Talking last week with a correspondent of the New York Herald, Senator Nelson said:

"When I recall my experience it seems to me remarkable that the men who are now agitating for this bonus can take the stand they do. During the first few months of the civil war the pay of the American soldier was about $11 a month and was finally increased to $16. At that time gold was at a premium and the soldiers were paid in a depreciated paper currency. What did they get in the late war? The lowest pay any man got was $30 a month and if he was a married man and had dependents allowances were made in addition to his regular pay.

"In the civil war we had no bacon. We had no ham. We got salt pork in a barrel of brine and we got salt beef. The only other meat we got was when could round up some cattle. The only vegetables we got were rice beans. We had no canned goods. We had to buy our tobacco, candy, and other knickknacks.

"When the soldiers came back home from the war they proved themselves to be the balance wheel in the life of the republic. They did their share during the construction period without seeking an enormous bonus while the country was overloaded with debt. Aside from pensions, which were given only to the men who were disabled, there was nothing akin to the bonus scheme in the days following the civil war, and there was none for nearly thirty years later. Prior to that it was simply a question of pensions to soldiers and widows of soldiers that had died in the service.

"In 1890 legislation was created to equalize the bounty to make it an allowance to those who had enlisted in the early part of the war, and to whom no bounty had been paid. Beyond that there was nothing done for the soldiers in the shape that is now asked by some of the posts of the American Legion."

Senator Nelson called attention to the pathetic condition of the Confederate soldiers on the losing side in the civil war.

"These men," he said, "went home to a devastated country and got no relief whatever. To be sure, their states eventually passed laws providing for crippled and disabled veterans, but beyond that none of them got any help. The men who went over to France and were disabled should be cared for. I am as anxious as anybody to do justice by them. Then if we could segregate them I should be very glad to do something for the soldiers who actually did any fighting, who participated in the St. Mihiel salient, in the campaign around Château-Thierry and the great final drive in bottling up the Germans in the Argonne.

"My heart goes out to the fighting soldiers, but I declare my heart can not go out to the 2,000,000 soldiers who stayed here in America in comfortable barracks and did nothing but drill and stand camp guard occasionally."

American Prestige in the Balance.

(New York World.)

The defeat of these treaties would make the position of any President, any Secretary of State, any Ambassador, any Senate leader, ridiculous. They would represent nobody. They would have no authority. There would be no one to conduct the business of the American people in the outer world. The defeat of these treaties would reduce the American Executive to the status of gamblers, and American diplomacy to a series of idle gestures. We announce that we desire a league. We go to Paris and insist upon a league. We obtain a league and we reject it. A few months later we start again. We announce that we desire a reduction of armaments and an association of nations. We invite the powers to come to Washington. We propose a plan and they accept it. Are we to reply: "Thank you very much, we were only fooling, we just wanted to see if you would bite again?"

There must be some limit to such trifling with the peace of the world. For, rich as we are, and strong as we are, and dependent as Europe is upon us, we are not so rich and so strong and so independent that we can afford to behave in the world as if we were a nation of spoiled movie stars. The peace of the world means something to us. The poverty and disorders of Europe have not left us untouched; the confusions of the world embrace us as well. Without us there can be no restoration. And in this crisis we serve notice on mankind that the American people is without a spokesman, without authority, without a government that can function, the confusion will become intolerable. Our own vast power for good will end in futility. In the middle of all civilized peoples we shall be classified as one of those nations, like the Russian of yesterday, with which it is impossible to do business, because the government has no power to bind the nation, has no mandate to act, can make no engagements that will be carried out.

German Liberals fear a trick has been turned against them in the production of a monumental film of Frederick the Great. It was discovered at the first showing that the film company has a production adapted to the Hohenzollern propaganda and it is suspected the film was produced with that end in view. These apprehensions are strengthened by the attitude of monarchist newspapers, which in their criticisms couple Hohenzollern panegyrics with commendation for the timely applause manifested at the goosestep scenes and find that the authors made full use of the slogans of Germany's military greatness in the titles. The Liberal papers allege that a well-directed clique is more interested in bringing out the royalist virtues of the story than the film merits, but they nevertheless praise the artistic qualities of the film. The first two sections present Frederick's history until his coronation, and the presentation took three hours.

France has suggested a monument of unusual type as a memorial for those who lost their lives when the Lusitania was sunk by a German torpedo. The proposed monument would be a statue of a mother, holding out her child to be saved, as she kneels on a bit of wreckage. The unusual feature of the memorial, however, would be that of placing it on a floating raft, at the scene of the sinking, off the coast of Ireland. The raft would be anchored there and the statue, projected to be eighty feet high, would be illuminated at night to serve as a beacon for mariners. The preliminary model has been made by George du Bois, celebrated French sculptor.

A German ex-artillerist has written a novel anticipatory of German victory in 1934. "German Resurrection" foretells how mysterious military societies will be formed, how extraordinary rays will blow up English ships at a distance of twenty-five kilometers, and how a gun sold as a toy becomes deadly by a slight adjustment. According to our optimistic German prophet all Germany rises in less time than it takes to tell and France is shattered at a blow.

EVENTS AND INCIDENTS.

Alas, poor Shakespeare! His relics had hardly been laid to their well-earned repose before scandal began to busy herself with his memory. First it was stated, on contemporary authority, that he died as the result of a drinking bout with Ben Jonson. Then came the quaint "William the Conqueror" story, disclosing his dispute with Burbage over the latchkey of one of the wives of the town, and a series of other such merrie conceits and innuendos gleaned from the recollections of quavering old men and "knitters in the sun." Lacking further hearsay, gossip turned her attention to the works of her victim, and opening the sonnets, pounced with a glad cry on the dark lady and the fair young man celebrated there as implicating their author in every frailty to which mankind is subject. And the last conceivable bolt seemed to have been shot when the German professors hailed him as a compatriot.

But one possible slander was left—and it constitutes perhaps the unkindest cut of all. The Macmillan Company has just published the play, "Will Shakespeare," that lately set London quarreling. In this invention Miss Clemence Dane, the authoress, intimates that Shakespeare wrote his best tragedy to please a dark-haired siren of the court whom the queen had appointed to inspire him.

After this outrageous arrow, there is only a minor affront in the suggestion that murder must be added to the "Swan of Avon's" shortcomings, that it was he and not an "apple squire" who stabbed Marlowe in the eye and killed him, or that the dispute was not over a tavern trull, but for the love of Mary Fitton, Elizabethan vamp and maid of honor. The further circumstance that the creator of Falstaff never vouchsafes a smile in the course of Miss Dane's play, or any trace of the wit that once resounded among the hogheads of the Mermaid, is not a slander; it is plain nonsense. The conception that Queen Elizabeth used Mary Fitton to lure him from Stratford and keep him in London, composing plays for the glory and renown of the British flag, is merely funny, in view of the low opinion in which the drama was then held; so also, for a different reason, is the scene in which the queen shuts him up in a candle-lit room and allows him an hour or two wherein to dash her off a scenario.

A notable thing about Miss Dane's play, however, is that, apart from its calumny on several great Elizabethans, it is a good play. It is written in a blank verse that recalls some of Shakespeare's in his sleeper moments, it has more than one stirring chord of sentiment, and it would have been quite admirable had it been written about a group of modern Art Guild poets, or had such a personality as Andreyev been the hero. But it is greatly to be regretted that, short of censorship, there is no means of restraining writers of fiction who misrepresent historical facts for the pleasure of seeing the critics turn purple or of shocking a jaded public into attentiveness.

There seems to be no occasion to qualify this with a graceful reference to the authoress' courage. If her treatment of historical truth represents bravery, the Victoria Cross would be a feeble tribute to the valor of Bill Nye.

A certain group of irreconcilables, who still cling to the political ideas of the last century, appear to have chosen as their motto, "There are only a few of us left." The legend invites us to picture them as staunch upholders of a doomed standard on a stricken field, reproaching with their bloody but unbowed heads, or their immaculate wigs and ruffles, as the case may be, the baseness of the demented mob. But there is no ground for regarding this attitude as a conclusive token of high-mindedness.

The European circuses are at present suffering from a shortage of the human curiosities with which nature, in her clumsier moments, has hitherto flooded the side-shows. There are only a few of them left, and their prestige has increased accordingly. Observers have remarked a touch of hauteur in the manner of these survivors, and have noticed that even the woolly lady of Borneo now walks on all fours with some condescension.

Zaghul Pasha, the leader of the Egyptian revolt, bears at least this earnest of greatness: that his friends can not find terms high enough or his enemies low enough with which to describe his character. Lord Milner apparently respected him; they were able, at any rate, to reach a friendly understanding on the crucial question of English military garrisons in Egypt, and the British government's refusal to concur in it caused Milner's resignation. There is no evidence that Zaghul deserved the fate of deportation to Ceylon, and the apparent injustice of this measure is aggravated by the fact that he had proposed to come to London and present his case—an act which, in itself, would have been a certain guarantee of fealty to the empire. It has been the particular misfortune of Mr. Churchill, who succeeded Lord Milner as colonial secretary, to be heavy-handed at the wrong moments—to advocate force when clemency was needed, and conversely. Mr. Churchill, in fact, embodies one of the chief obstacles to a cordial agreement between England and America. Paradoxically enough, he is half American, but the only quality he seems to have derived from this republic is a headlong and impetuous energy, and it leads him into equivocal extremes of reactionary and liberal policy. He is a political soldier of fortune and his habit of switching banners has had more than a little to do with our mistrust of the avowals of the English government. Every thinking person must concede the necessity of an adequate English force in Egypt; between this and military oppression, however, there is no necessary link. It is possible that Milner erred in estimating the military necessities in that quarter, but he would never have consented to the graver error of quelling discussion by an arrogant assertion of force.

Charles Dickens, more than sixty years ago, most effectively ridiculed the efficiency crotchets in education in "Hard Times." On rereading the novel, one wonders at the antiquity of many modern ideas. Gradgrind's school is the kind of thing that we might now be finding in American fiction if we had an intelligent satirist. For some reason or other, no scenario writer has yet purloined the plot of "Hard Times," but it has all the movie requirements: devoted sister in a small town who marries a rich old man to defray the debts of a wastrel brother; rich young man from the metropolis with a surplus of charm and no morals, who divines the situation and pretends to extricate the brother from his scrapes, but with the real purpose of winning the young wife's affections and making off with her—the sins of the brother being further visited on an innocent party in the person of a humble and honest workman, whose marital afflictions and inability to obtain a much-needed divorce supply the underplot of the story. There are many other modern features in it, but perhaps the most surprising occurs in a brief passage in which a smart young man of the period is asked by his host if he would like to smoke. His reply, which sounds almost as if it had been written yesterday, is, "I believe you"—in other words, "You said it." In the matter of picturesque slang, as in most other things, we seem to have very little on the age of Victoria. The Chinese may be right in believing that a man of enterprise is very well employed in trying to catch up with his ancestors.

A peculiar difference between censorships in England and America is that while the American moralists are very strict about printed matter, the British tolerate almost anything in print and reserve their indignation for theatrical misdemeanors. It may be either a cause or a result that our greatest offenses against decency and convention have occurred in print, and theirs on the stage. A printed account of the questionable scenes enacted on the English stage since Shakespeare's time would cause a commotion in American censorships circles.

The fate of Mr. George Branch Cabell's "Jurgen" illustrates the contradictory nature of this intolerance. When the book was censored in America, English readers became sufficiently curious about it to warrant its publication in London, and it is now accessible to the British Empire in a special edition. To judge from the critical notices thus far given Mr. Cabell's chef d'œuvre by the English press, it has aroused no great enthusiasm of censure or approval. The critics content themselves with the mild comment that the sexual motif seems a little overdone, and that the author has injured the quality of his satire by throwing Steinvor, Walburga, Anaitis, Heitman Michael, and others such into a conglomerate burlesque, without any deference to the various atmospheres of legend and history from which they have been drawn.

The novel owes its present extraordinary vogue among American critics, not so much to its literary and philosophic value (though it at least equals in this respect Maurice Hewlett's more sensuous tales of mediæval love) as to its impudent defiance of the censor. Mr. Cabell tried to be profoundly immoral at the expense of the deacons by wrapping his immorality in a veil of cynical alluiveness which he thought too opaque for their literal intelligences. Had he succeeded the laugh would have been on the censors. Since he did not, owing to the delirious explicitness with which the Neo-Pagan sons of the morning expounded the profundities of his wit, the decree of the censor went forth, and Mr. Cabell and his book were apotheosized—a result he doubtless foresaw. At some future day this will all align itself in its true perspective. The whole point and pith of Mr. Cabell's humor depends on a temporary hypocrisy of the American public, and though the action of the censors in his case was a solemn absurdity, the suppression of his book is no disaster. Burlesque and allegory are the curse of American letters. Our literature will have reached a respectable level only when it presents something that writers of other countries think worthy of satirizing. And we give the efficiency of the censor an undeserved tribute when we imagine that every book he denounces is a masterpiece.

AUBREY BOYD.

SAN FRANCISCO, February 15, 1922.

The English "Book of Common Prayer" was originally called the "King's Primer." It was published in 1546 by command of Henry VIII. Twice revised in the reign of Edward VI, and again in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I, it was ultimately brought to its present form.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Miss Frances Marion Brandon is the first woman to become an assistant corporation counsel of the city of New York.

Mr. E. W. Beatty of the Canadian Pacific Railway is said to be the youngest of railroad presidents. Mr. Beatty, who is forty-three years of age, directs 20,000 miles of railroads and scores of ocean liners.

Miss Tennyson Jesse, an English novelist and a granddaughter of Alfred Tennyson, has recently announced her marriage. She has been the wife of Captain H. M. Harwood, English playwright and actor, for two years.

Secretary of Labor Davis has blossomed forth as the first author among the counselors of President Harding in an intensely dramatic recital of his own career, beginning as a poor immigrant lad from Wales and leading step by step to his present exalted and responsible post in the executive part of the government. The Secretary came from a picturesque part of Wales, Tredegar, where he was born almost fifty years ago, and his parents settling in Pittsburgh, he began his industrial career in that bustling city at the age of eleven, in the puddling department of the great iron and steel works which has made its fame. His connection with labor units and with the Loyal Order of Moose are both entertaining and valuable contributions to the annals of those activities.

The Explorers' Club of New York City has unanimously reelected Vilhjalmur Stefansson president. This is a position which Admiral Peary held for several years before his death. It is interesting to recall the strong friendship between these two greatest Arctic explorers, who differed so much in method, yet each of whom received his greatest tribute from the other. Peary made his dash to the pole using the method of transporting food by sled relay. Stefansson revolutionized methods of Arctic work by proving that no such dependence on civilized food is necessary, and that one can live "off the country," whether on the seemingly barren land of Banks Island or traveling on the ice over unsounded depths of polar ocean. The story of this later remarkable journey is told in his new book, "The Friendly Arctic."

Sir William Barton, speaking at Oldham, said he believed Lord Birkenhead to be the most forceful politician in England at the present time, and Mr. Lloyd George would have to do all he could to keep in front of him. Lord Birkenhead, whose family name is Smith, was born at Birkenhead in 1872, the son of a barrister, so that his taste for law and politics is inherited. He was a classical scholar at Oxford, and made first-class final honors in the School of Jurisprudence in 1894. His subsequent career to 1900 was that of a fellow and lecturer in several of the Oxford colleges. In 1903 he went into politics as the Conservative candidate for the Scotland Division of Liverpool, and again for the Walton Division in 1905. In 1908 he was king's council and bencher of Gray's Inn; solicitor-general in 1915, and treasurer, 1917-18. From 1906 to 1919 he had been M. P. for the Walton Division, Liverpool, thus doubling up on law and politics. His war record is as follows: On active service with Indian Corps in France, 1914; captain in King's Own Oxfordshire Hussars, and temporary lieutenant-colonel in the army. Lord Birkenhead is the author of a number of political studies, as well as some literary ones.

Few English statesmen and perhaps none in this country have the marked versatility of the British cabinet minister, Winston Churchill. Mr. Churchill's latest manifestation of many-sidedness is marine painting. He exhibited for a long time under an assumed name, and his pictures had won recognition even in Paris before he confessed the artist's identity. He has now acquired such celebrity that he has orders of the most flattering sort for any future canvases he may have time to paint. His ability as a writer has an older reputation. He has recently published a critical review of the work of Sir John Lavery, the eminent painter of portraits and of Irish historical scenes. Mr. Churchill's art criticism is ranked among the soundest of contemporary writers. Americans may take a pride in Mr. Churchill. The grandson of Larry Jerome of New York and son of that most brilliant New York belle, Jennie Jerome, he seems to come naturally by his talents. His first cousin, Shane Leslie, is among the foremost essayists, historians, and editors of the day, and several of the daughters of Moreton Frewen, also cousins, have made their mark in literature and art. Mr. Churchill is an accomplished musician and a critic of music.

Sir John Lavery, president of the Royal Academy of London, who is one of the most renowned artists of the day and whose canvases adorn nearly every notable picture gallery of the world, is an enthusiastic Irishman, a native of Belfast and a member of the famous Irish Society of Art, which has been located for nearly 200 years in Dublin. Sir John is committed to a fair division of his time with his country people and will place on canvas some of the scenes which have resulted in the founding of the Irish Free State, besides painting the portraits of several of the chief figures in this important international negotiation. Lady Lavery, who is one of the powerful hostesses of the British capital and is the accepted leader in all amenities growing out of the æsthetic branches, art, music, and letters, was, before marrying the illustrious artist, the widow of Dr. Edward Livingston Trudeau of New York, another eminent man, equally famous in the healing arts and in the domain of letters. Dr. Trudeau was for years a professor of surgery in Columbia Medical College and the director of many of the great establishments in the Adirondacks, whither he was compelled by ill health to spend his last years. Lady Lavery was Miss Hazel Martyn, daughter of Dr. Edward Jenner Martyn of Chicago. She was identified with the artists' set in Chicago and in New York and has done some excellent work in pastels. Sir John maintains a fine studio in Paris and is as hospitable to the rather nondescript crowds of students on the left bank of the Seine as to the dignified members of the London Academy in his sumptuous home in Cromwell Place.

OLD FAVORITES.

Winter in Northumberland.

Outside the garden
The wet skies harden,
The gates are barred on

The summer side:
"Shut out the flower-time,
Sunbeam and shower-time;
Make way for our time,"
Wild winds have cried.
Green once and cheery,
The woods, worn weary,
Sigh as the dreary

Weak sun goes home:
A great wind grapples
The wave, and dapples

The dead green floor of the sea with foam.

Through fell and moorland,
And salt-sea foreland,
Our noisy norland

Resounds and rings;
Waste waves thereunder
Are blown in sunder

And winds make thunder
With cloud-wide wings.
Sea-drift makes dimmer
The beacon's glimmer;
Nor sail nor swimmer

Can try the tides,
And snowdrifts thicken
Where, when leaves quicken,
Under the heather the sundew hides. . . .

Each reed that grows in
Our stream is frozen,
The fields it flows in

Are hard and black;
The water-fairy
Waits wise and wary

Till time shall vary
And thaws come back.
"O sister, water,"

The wind besought her,
"O twin-born daughter
Of spring with me,

Stay with me, play with me,
Take the warm way with me,
Straight for the summer and oversea."

But winds will vary,
And wise and wary
The patient fairy

Of water waits;
All shrunk and wizen,
In iron prison,

Till spring re-risen
Unbars the gates;
Till, as with clamor
Of axe and hammer,

Chained streams that stammer
And struggle in straits
Burst bonds that shiver,
And thaws deliver

The roaring river in stormy spates.

The Milkmaid.

Across the grass I see her pass;
She comes with tripping pace,—
A maid I know,—and March winds blow

Her hair across her face:—
With a hey, Dolly! ho, Dolly!
Dolly shall be mine,

Before the spray is white with May,
Or blooms the eglantine.

The March winds blow. I watch her go:
Her eye is brown and clear;
Her cheek is brown, and soft as down,
(To those who see it near!)

With a hey, Dolly! ho, Dolly!
Dolly shall be mine,
Before the spray is white with May,
Or blooms the eglantine.

What has she not that those have got,—
The dames that walk in silk!
If she undo her kerchief blue
Her neck is white as milk.

With a hey, Dolly! ho, Dolly!
Dolly shall be mine,
Before the spray is white with May,
Or blooms the eglantine.

Let those who will be proud and chill!
For me, from June to June,
My Dolly's words are sweet as curds—
Her laugh is like a tune:—

With a hey, Dolly! ho, Dolly!
Dolly shall be mine,
Before the spray is white with May,
Or blooms the eglantine.

Break, break to her, O crocus-spear!
O tall Lent-lilies flame!
There'll be a bride at Easter-tide,
And Dolly is her name.

With a hey, Dolly! ho, Dolly!
Dolly shall be mine,
Before the spray is white with May,
Or blooms the eglantine.—Austin Dobson.

THE DECOLLETE ISLANDERS.

R. M. Weaver Tells of Early Invasions in the Pacific.

Senator Lodge's recent dithyramb about the coral reefs of the South Pacific represents almost the closing strain of a lay to which Herman Melville sounded the prelude. The age of romance in the South Seas is dead, or virtually so. Already the hideous instruments of our industrial culture have girdered the tracts beyond the sunset in frames of steel, and the day so much abhorred by Melville has come, when a machine-impelled and germ-ridden Christendom was to devastate in its grimy and relentless Western course the last island refuges of Pan.

To the inevitability of this result the beauty of the ravaged region has largely contributed. Melville was the first and greatest of the literary explorers to make articulate the poetic lure of these hazy ocean reaches, and his successors, from Stevenson, and London to Somerset Maugham and Frederick O'Brien, have all added a magnetic touch, in their fashion, to that enchantment. Before their day missionaries and traders had been drawn into the "waters of these wondrous isles" by a thirst for converts or for gold, with results that leave one thoughtful as to the meaning of progress. But even they acknowledged in some degree the attractiveness of the thing they were appointed to destroy, and were sensible, in a measure, to what we call its "romance."

This word "romance" is a prismatic term that presents very different facets to different minds. Its significance to the average European and American seems to be profoundly mingled with the idea of clothes—an idea which, as Carlyle shrewdly observed, affects most of our concepts. It was not with this kind of romance that Melville and Stevenson were mainly concerned, but it is safe to say that for a majority of their readers the most fascinating aspect of Polynesian society is its sartorial simplicity. On this truth Anatole France has built some of his most diverting satires in "The Island of the Penguins." And the history of the subjugation of the Pacific islanders to a clothed morality by traders, missionaries, and "romantic" excursionists has been so interestingly compiled by Mr. Weaver from the records of these authorities on propriety as to be worth a thought before touching on the central theme of his book.

Tahiti and the Marquesas, the islands best known to Melville, were among the first to receive the ministrations. The Marquesas were discovered in 1595 by the Spanish adventurer, Alvaro Mendana de Neyra, on his way to occupy the Solomon Islands, which he had discovered twenty-eight years earlier. To the new insular group he gave the name Marquesas de Mendoca, in honor of his patron, the viceroy of Peru. They were not again molested till Captain Cook visited them in 1774. A few years before, the English mariner Wallis had penetrated the archipelago of the Society Islands and discovered Tahiti:

Wallis' account of Otaheite—on the authority of the London Missionary Society "to be pronounced so as to rhyme with the adjective mighty"—and its people, occupies a great part of his narrative. Though his reception was not without a show of arms and bloodshed, the native women exerted themselves tirelessly to do unselfish penance for the hostile behavior of the native males. Oammo, the ruling chief, retired from the scene, leaving the felicitation of the strangers in the hands of his consort, Oherea, "whose whole character," according to the observations of the London Missionary Society, "for sensuality exceeded even the usual standard of Otaheite." In the establishment of friendship that ensued, Wallis sent Lieutenant Fureaux ashore to erect a British pennant, and in defiance of the Pope, to take formal possession of the island in the name of King George the Third. Hopelessly unimpressed by the whole transaction, the natives took down the flag during the night, and for a long time afterwards the ruling chieftains wore it about their persons as a badge of royalty. Oherea's hospitality was requited by a parting gift of some turkeys, a gander, a goose, and a cat. Oherea's live stock figures repeatedly in the later annals of Tahiti.

Among the gifted English writers of George III's reign the members of the London Missionary Society, founded in 1795, proved themselves very adroit in the realm of light literature. Their spirited accounts of the morals and manners of the Polynesians show that even a Wesleyan pen can be brisk on the subject of clothes. On Sunday, March 5, 1797, the good ship Duff, which the society had sent forth from Spithead in the previous year, dropped anchor off Tahiti to disembark thirty missionaries, four ministers, six carpenters, two shoemakers, two bricklayers, two tailors and a hatter (solemn omen), two smiths, two weavers, a surgeon, a cotton manufacturer, a cabinetmaker, a harnessmaker, a tinsmith, a cooper, and a butcher. As the natives came out to greet the anchored ship the missionaries noticed with a somewhat plaintive regret that the beauty of the women had been slightly exaggerated in the explorers' tales:

Next day—for they arrived on the Sabbath—some of the missionaries landed and were presented with the house King Pomare had built for Captain Bligh. This important matter settled, the chief thought it time to enquire after entertainment; "first sky-rockets, next the violin and dancing, and lastly the bagpipe." Lacking such diversions, the missionaries offered a few solos on the German flute—and "it plainly appeared that more lively music would have pleased them better."

Domestic arrangements established, to the great diversion of the natives, the missionaries tried to get some clothes on some of them. The queen had to rip open the garments, it is true, to get into them; but one Tanno Manoo, who was given a warm week-day dress, and a showy morning gown and petticoat for the Sundays, "when dressed, made a very decent appearance; taking more pains to cover her breasts, and even to keep her feet from being seen, than most of the ladies of England have of late done." The natives were deeply perplexed by the proprieties of the missionaries, and especially by what to them seemed the unnatural chastity of the men.

Since the missionaries had resolved to distribute their blessings, they sent a party of brethren to make investigations on the Marquesas. The first visitors the ship received from the shore were "seven beautiful young women, swimming quite naked, except for a few green leaves tied around their middle; nor did our mischievous goats even suffer them to keep their green leaves, but as they turned to avoid them they were attacked on each side alternately, and completely stripped naked." Such, too, was their "symmetry of features, that as models for the statuary and painter their equals can seldom be found." As they danced about the deck, frequently bursting out into mad fits of laughter, or talking fast as their tongues could go, surely they must have convinced more than one of the meditative brethren of the total depravity of man. Nor did these shameless savages confine their excursions to the decks. "It was not a little affecting to see our own seamen repairing the rigging, attended by a group of the most beautiful females, who were employed to pass the ball, or carry the tar-bucket, etc.; and this they did with the greatest assiduity, often besmearing themselves with the tar in the execution of their office. No ship's company, without great restraints from God's grace, could ever have resisted such temptations."

Harris and Crook, two of the brethren, daring temptation, decided to stay at the Marquesa, and were moved ashore. But before the Duff sailed back to Tahiti, Harris was found on the shore about 4 o'clock one morning "in a most pitiable plight, and like one out of his senses." It appears that the Marquesan chief Teneae, taking Crook upon an inland jaunt, had departed, conferring upon Harris all the privileges of domesticity. Teneae's wife, sharing her husband's ideas of hospitality, was troubled at Harris' reserve. So, "finding herself treated with total neglect, became doubtful of his sex," says the London Missionary Society in a report dedicated to George the Third, "and accordingly some of the other females with her suspicion, who accordingly came in the night, when he slept, and satisfied themselves concerning that point, but not in such a peaceable way but that they awoke him. Discovering so many strangers, he was greatly terrified; and, perceiving what they had been doing, was determined to leave a place where the people were so abandoned and given up to wickedness; a cause which should have excited a contrary resolution."

Whether the subsequent reports indicate a low degree of intelligence in the Polynesian seems open to question:

"Their life is without toil," the brethren reported, "and every man is at liberty to do, go and act as he pleases, without the distress of care or apprehension of want: and as their leisure is great, their sports and amusements are various." Their personal beauty, their almost ostentatious cleanliness, their boundless generosity, were by the London Missionary Society insisted upon. The best of them, however, lived "in a fearfully promiscuous intercourse," and emulated the classical Greeks in infanticide and other reprehensible practices. Yet do the brethren allow that "in their dances alone is immodesty permitted; it may be affirmed, they have in many instances more refined ideas of decency than ourselves. They say that Englishmen are ashamed of nothing, and that we have led them to public acts of indecency never before practiced among them." But then, as the London Missionary Society says in another place: "Their ideas, no doubt, of shame and delicacy are very different from ours; they are not yet advanced to any such state of civilization and refinement." At their departure from native custom, however, they were untroubled by contrition. When asked "what is the true atonement for sin?" they answered, "Hogs and pearls." When the pleasant novelty of being exhorted and preached to wore off, they did not behave impeccably during the devotions of the brethren. They often cried out "lies" and "nonsense" during the sermon. At other times they tried to make each other laugh by repeating sentences after the brethren, or by playing antics, and making faces. Many of the natives used to lie down and sleep as soon as the sermon began, while "others were so trifling as to make remarks upon the missionaries' clothes, or upon their appearance. Thus Satan filled their hearts with folly, lest they should believe and be saved." All the best inducements the brethren could hold out to tempt them into "the divine life" moved them not. "You talk to us of salvation, and we are dying," they said; "we want no other salvation than to be cured of our diseases and to live here always, and to eat and talk." So unappreciative were they of the efforts of the brethren that they explained the presence of the missionaries in Tahiti as growing out of a sensible desire to escape from the ugliness and worry and brutality of European civilization.

In 1833 the French establishment of the Œuvre de la Propagation de la Foi authorized the society of Picpus to convert all the islands of the Pacific to Catholicism. In this crusade the Catholic missionaries were not without assistance from the secular arm:

At this time, it was a law of Tahiti that before a foreigner could have leave to reside on the island, permission must be granted by Queen Pomare and the chiefs. The Catholic missionaries, aware of this regulation, succeeded, however, in effecting a landing disguised as carpenters, and to this island, partly idolatrous, partly heretic, they gave the salutation of peace. Pomare, however, was unappreciative of their salute, and refused to the disguised priests permission to remain. This exclusion, in its sequel, raised the most delicate questions of international diplomacy, and bestir Pomare to scatter anxious letters broadcast over the face of the earth. Her correspondence included a cosmopolitan company of commodores and admirals, Queen Victoria, the President of the United States, and Louis Philippe of France. Admiral Du Petit-Thouars, in command of the Venus, was dispatched to Tahiti under special orders, "to make the queen and the inhabitants feel that France is a great and powerful nation." The Venus arrived at Tahiti, August 27, 1838, and proceeded to summary justice. Under the pressure of a broadside, Pomare was obliged to beg the pardon of the most Christian King. "I am only," she wrote to Louis Philippe, "the sovereign of a little insignificant island; may glory and power be with your majesty—let your anger cease; and pardon me the mistake that I have made."

It was further demanded of Pomare that she pay "a great and powerful nation" the sum of two thousand dollars as a more solid reparation for her bad behavior. Pomare was appalled at the magnitude of the sum: there was no such amplitude of wealth in her treasury. The missionaries were moved in compassion to finance her political indiscretion. But in the next humiliation dealt out to her, the brethren were unable to offer much assistance. The French admiral bore instructions to require that the French flag be hoisted the day following the receipt of the two thousand dollars, and that it be honored by Pomare with a salute of twenty-one guns. The situation was awkward. Pomare was very short of powder. She assured the admiral she had not enough for more than five shots. The admiral paced the deck, and passed his fingers through his hair in considerable agitation. "What will they say in France," said the patriotic commander, "when they know that I furnished the powder to salute my own flag?" The difficulty was great. An expedient was necessary, and the admiral hit upon one: "Mr. Consul," said he to the Rev. Pritchard, and British consul, "I can give you some powder, and you can do with it as you please." According to the French report, Pritchard "himself loaded the bad cannon on the little island and directed the firing"; and soon after, the French observed Pritchard to look "thin and bilious, with an appearance of pride, and the cold dignity so natural to the English."

When the French visitors had set up Moerenhaut as their consul and taken their leave, after a series of what one of our cabaret proprietors has called "fêtes bohemian and capers comique," Queen Pomare wrote a letter to her sister sovereign Victoria, imploring "the shelter of her wing, the defense of her lion, and the protection of her flag":

This breach of international courtesy brought Captain Laplace on the Artemise out to Tahiti "to obtain satisfaction from the Lutheran evangelists who had forced themselves on a simple and docile people." As the Artemise was off the coast, on April 22, 1839, she struck on a coral reef: an accident that resulted in the officers and crew being lodged on shore for two months. These two months must have given the brethren bitter fruit for reflection upon the ease with which their years of unselfish striving could be obliterated. According to the account of Louis Reybaud of the Artemise: "From the first, the most perfect harmony prevailed between the ship's company and the natives. Each of the latter chose his tayo—that is, another self—among the sailors. Between tayos everything is common. At night, the tayos, French and Tahitian, went together to the common hut. Every sailor has thus a house, a wife, a complete domestic establishment. As jealousy is a passion unknown to these islanders, it may be imagined what resources and pleasures such an arrangement afforded our crew. The natives were delighted with the character of our people; they had never met with such gaiety, expansiveness, and kindness in any other foreigners. The beach presented the aspect of a continual holiday, to the great scandal of the missionaries. We have seen how the men managed, and what friends they found. The officers were not less fortunate. The island that Bougainville called the New Cytherea does not belie its name. When the evening set in, every tree along the coast shaded an impassioned pair; and the waters of the river afforded an asylum to a swarm of copper-colored nymphs, who came to enjoy themselves with the young midshipmen. Wherever you walked you might hear the oui! oui! oui! the word that all the women have learnt with marvelous facility. It would have been far more difficult to teach them to say non!"

Among these relaxations, Captain Laplace found time publicly to declare to the islanders "how shameful and even dangerous it was to violate the faith of treaties, and how unjust and barbarous was intolerance." Before his sailing, Captain Laplace commanded Pomare to come aboard the Artemise to sign a treaty guaranteeing no discrimination against the French. Pomare's despondency at the beginning of the proceedings was solaced by champagne and brandy. Casimir Henry, who accompanied the Artemise throughout her circumnavigatory voyage, says: "When the spirits of the party were sufficiently elevated to find everything good, and while the hands were yet sufficiently steady not to let the pen drop, the treaty was produced as the crowning act of the festivity."

It was less than a decade later that Herman Melville, the greatest of American sea writers, hove into the bay of Tyoehe, in Nukuheva of the Marquesas, on the whaling ship Acushnet. Several weeks before his arrival the French admiral, Du Petit-Thouars, had brought his conquest of these islands to completion in the same harbor:

More worthy emissaries than the pilot to the port of Tyoehe were to welcome Melville to the Marquesas. The entrance of the Acushnet brought from the shore a flotilla of native canoes. "Such strange outcries and passionate gesticulations I never certainly heard or saw before," Melville says. "You would have thought the islanders were on the point of flying at one another's throats, whereas they were only amiably engaged in disentangling their boats." Melville was surprised at the strange absence of a single woman in the invading party, not then knowing that canoes were "taboo" to women, and that consequently, "whenever a Marquesan lady voyages by water she puts into requisition the paddles of her own fair body."

As the Acushnet approached within a mile and a half of the foot of the bay, Melville noticed a singular commotion in the water ahead of the vessel: the women, swimming out from shore, eager to embrace the advantages of civilization. "As they drew nearer," Melville says, "and as I watched the rising and sinking of their forms, and beheld the uplifted right arm bearing above the water the girdle of tappa, and their long dark hair trailing beside them as they swam, I almost fancied they could be nothing else but so many mermaids. Under slow headway we sailed right into the midst of these swimming nymphs, and they boarded us at every quarter; many seizing hold of the chain-plates and springing into the chains; others, at the peril of being run over by the vessel in her course, catching at the bob-stays, and wreathing their slender forms about the ropes, hung suspended in the air. All of them at length succeeded in getting up the ship's side, where they clung dripping with the brine and glowing with the bath, their jet-black tresses streaming over their shoulders, and half enveloping their otherwise naked forms. There they hung, sparkling with savage vivacity, laughing gayly at one another, and chattering away with infinite glee. Nor were they idle the while, for each performed the simple offices of the toilet for the other. Their luxuriant locks, wound up and twisted into the smallest possible compass, were freed from the briny element; the whole person carefully dried, and from a small little round shell that passed from hand to hand, anointed with a fragrant oil: their adornments were completed by passing a few loose folds of white tappa, in a modest cincture, around the waist. Thus arrayed, they no longer hesitated, but flung themselves lightly over the bulwarks, and were quickly frolicking about the decks. Many of them went forward, perching upon the headrails or running out upon the bowsprit, while others seated themselves upon the taffrail, or reclined at full length upon the boats."

The ship was fairly captured, and it yielded itself willing prisoner. In the evening, after anchor had been struck, the deck was hung with lanterns, and the women, decked in flowers, danced with "an abandoned voluptuousness" that was a prelude "to every species of riot and debauchery."

The character and exploits of Herman Melville will be detailed in the next issue of the Argonaut.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending February 11, 1922, were $120,800,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $106,800,000; a gain of $14,000,000.

During the week preceding Christmas bonds suffered a slight recession, but the downward movement was of short duration, the year closing with a strong and steady market. Activity is normally expected in the opening weeks of the new year, and the current month has reflected this customary tendency.

For a time issues of large size have been offered in quick succession, with some resultant difficulty in securing investment distribution. This does not appear to be an indication of saturation of the market, but rather is evidence of sharp competition for issues, with a resulting lowering of yield somewhat ahead of the expectations of the investing public (says the National Bank of Commerce in New York in Commerce Monthly).

Total transactions in bonds on the New York Stock Exchange from December 16th to tion of the international character of the American market. An issue of $30,000,000 of 6 per cent. bonds of the Kingdom of Denmark due in 1942 was offered to yield about 6½ per cent. The decline in yields on comparable classes of bonds is strikingly evidenced by comparison of this issue with that of $25,000,000 of bonds of the Kingdom of Denmark, bearing 8 per cent, and offered at par in this market on October 22, 1920.

The offering here of $25,000,000 of preferred debenture stock by the Canadian Pacific Railway at 78, to yield 5.13 per cent., was also of special significance. Securities of this road have long been favorites in the Canadian and British markets, but New York bidders secured this issue in competition with London. The largest industrial offering during the last thirty days was an issue of $30,000,000 of bonds of the American Sugar Refining Company, due in 1937 and bearing 6 per cent., and offered at 98½ to yield 6.15 per cent.

Beating optimistic toms-toms over the outlook for the ensuing year will not change the basis facts (says Theodore F. MacManus in Detroit Saturday Night).

Faith in the ultimate soundness of all things American is not an unhealthy habit, but shutting both eyes and ears to the immediate obstacles is not healthy optimism, but fatuous folly.

Brushing aside all other problems—and their number, of course, is legion—there is a sufficient threat in one condition alone to induce a state of industrial semi-paralysis for the next twenty-four months.

The lugubrious plaint of the high tax payer is always an unwelcome sound. It is calculated to produce hoots and jeers rather than expressions of sympathy. Indeed, if there is any organized malice in this nation, it is the spontaneous hatred of those-who-have-not for those-who-have.

The popular retort to any protest against a paralyzing surtax is, "I wish I had the chance to pay a high surtax—I would be glad to do so."

This, of course, is very human; but it is also very silly and short-sighted.

The bold, brutal fact is that existing surtaxes contain within themselves conclusive reason why business can not fully recover until the burden is lightened or lifted.

It would be impossible to understand why Washington remains blind to this fact, if it were not for the muddiness of mind which engulfs almost every branch of human thought at the present moment.

The crushing effect of the surtax on nearly all business enterprise and development is a thing that advertises itself to the high heavens. It needs no definition or analysis. It is final because it embargoes, at the very outset, every effort of individual, industrial, or professional ability.

When it is realized that the larger investor today can enjoy a larger income without risk or worry than if he ventured the same amount in industrial enterprises, the stifling effect of the surtax on business can be readily understood.

It can be seen even more plainly when it is considered that the man who nets a profit of, let us say, $150,000 in a year by dint of the hardest kind of work and skillful enterprise is, by reason of the present tax, penalized $58,140, while he who draws an equal or greater income by simply investing his money, is left to enjoy that income to the full.

The government, through the surtax, literally sets a premium on idleness for those who, financially and individually, should be the enlivening factors of commerce and industry.

As was recently pointed out in an article in the Saturday Evening Post:

"The surtax creates two distinct classes of rich men—those who have to pay and those who do not have to pay. It falls with particular force also upon the younger business men, the comers. Those who already have fortunes convert them into exempt securities, but the executives on incomes of from $20,000 to $30,000 or $40,000 a year are prevented from accumulating even moderate fortunes. Though the rates, of course, are much lower on such incomes than on the $100,000 and upward class, they are large enough relatively to prevent the accumulation of even small estates. Such men have practically no principal to convert into exempt securities, and the margin between their living expenses and income is so much smaller than in the case of men with larger fortunes that with the imposition of the super-taxes they have ceased to a large extent to save and to invest at all."

Bluntly, the man who would seek under existing conditions to double or treble his monetary volume would be a fool.

The blighting, killing effort involved upon his own energies would be enough, of itself, to give him pause.

This penalty, plus the added burden of grotesque and almost impossible tax, renders the effort suicidal.

To quote further from the article previously mentioned:

"There are only two sources of taxes: wealth and consumption. Careful students of the subject say that to tax either exclusive of the other is to invite disaster. Three-fourths to four-fifths of the Federal revenues comes from wealth, and nine-tenths of state and local revenue comes from the same place. The strain is too great. Expert opinion is in agreement that supertaxes of not to exceed one-third, in place of three-quarters, would actually have the ultimate effect of an increase in revenue; that is, the rich would really pay more in the end if taxes were put on a level where they could be more generally collected."

"From 1916 to 1918 the number of incomes of $300,000 and over on which taxes were paid decreased 52 per cent and the amount paid fell from $1,000,000,000 to $400,000,000. Soaking the rich as a policy has merely defeated its own ends."

Washington knows all this, but unhappily agrarian malice has the Washington ear.

For the moment Mr. Capper and his friends are in a position to apply the screws.

Of course, their reign can not endure indefinitely because it is not only basically unjust, but will in due time become self-destructive.

It is trite to say that the prosperity of agriculture is dependent upon the prosperity of the people as a whole. It is equally obvious that the coöperation of capital is vital to national prosperity.

Confiscatory taxation that forces the wealth of the country away from the nation's industries and public utilities is certain to hit the farmer equally as hard as others.

The agriculturist can not indefinitely penalize and paralyze industrial initiative without digging a grave for himself.

Meanwhile, the dazed silence of big and little business, while this disemboweling process proceeds, is hard to explain, unless we remind ourselves again that all human thought is bewildered, and that even hard money has become, not merely helpless, but hysterical.

In 1921 the trader in stocks could have made quite as much money on the short as on the long side. Mexican Petroleum declined fully 50 points; Atlantic Gulf, more than 40; American Sugar and Sears Roebuck, nearly 40; Industrial Alcohol, United Drug, and American Agricultural Chemical, between 20 and 30 points. At the same time, American Ice and Studebaker advanced between 30 and 40 points; while American Car and Foundry, American Locomotive, and Corn passing of every month decreased the surplus supply of the metal and strengthened their position. The equipments advanced because they continued to report good earnings and because their long period of large profits had made them popular speculations. The sugar, rubber, and fertilizer stocks declined in 1921 because of the further price readjustments, in the first two industries, and the loss of farm buying power in the third. In the instances where individual stocks in the same group moved in opposite directions there was always the motive of response to current earnings or the earnings outlook for different stocks.

In short, 1921 was a year of readjustment in the stock market as in general business. With business out of joint, stock prices could not be expected to move in unison. The question for the speculator to decide now is whether this readjustment is to extend throughout 1922, or whether business and security prices will move more in unison.

It seems likely that as one industry after another gets back to a level from which recovery may reasonably be expected to start there will gradually develop a general upward trend in business and security prices. If that promise is correct, the most satisfying profits may be made this year in the stocks that declined last year; but until there is some indication of general and widespread industrial improvement it will be necessary to discriminate between stocks.

The sugar and rubber industries have apparently touched bottom. In these groups such stocks as American Sugar and Cuban-American, Lee Rubber & Tire, and U. S. Rubber look like good speculations. While lower prices may yet be seen for the fertilizer stocks, because of the serious financial position of the farmer, it appears to be time to purchase at least half of the number of shares desired. In this group both the common and preferred stocks of American Agricultural Chemical, International Agricultural, and Virginia-Carolina Chemical are attractive at present prices, if bought to hold for a long pull.

The recent wild speculation in Gulf State Steel, calculated to entice unwary speculators into buying stocks that are tipped for "merger" manipulations regardless of intrinsic values, has made it seem unwise to buy various specialties which have had disproportional advances until the market has had what Wall Street calls a "healthy reaction."

There are a number of issues, however, such as Endicott-Johnson, U. S. Realty, Buterick Company, Industrial Alcohol, Columbia Gas & Electric, Central Leather, American Can, Public Service of New Jersey, and some of the coppers, such as Kennecott, Cerro de Pasco, Utah, Anaconda, and Chile, and the zinc stock, Butte & Superior, where anticipation of dividends, good earnings actual or in prospect, or an improved outlook have not been entirely discounted. Already some talk of resumption at the copper mines is heard. This should help the coppers as a group.

Among the rails, the standard stocks, led by Atchison, have been advancing in response to investment buying. Union Pacific, Southern Pacific, Illinois Central, New York Central, and others of the old-line dividend payers should eventually work higher. But, at the present stage of speculation in rails, there seem to be greater possibilities of profit in some of the low-priced rails which have not kept pace with the advance in the main group. Such good earners among the little rails as Rock Island, Kansas City Southern, St. Louis-San Francisco, and St. Louis & Southwestern should before long respond to renewed speculative interest. And such promising non-dividend-paying preferred stocks as the St. Louis-San Francisco, St. Louis & Southwestern, and Missouri Pacific issues are also worthy of attention.

Finished manufactures exported from the United States in the calendar year 1921 formed a larger percentage of our exports than in any pre-war year, and their value, despite the 1921 fall in prices, was more than double that of any year preceding the war.

Of course it was not to be expected (says the Trade Record of the National City Bank of New York) that the group "manufactures for use in manufacturing" would form as large a percentage of the exports in 1921 as in pre-war years, for most of this class of material exported was sent to the factories of Europe, which have not yet resumed their pre-war activities and purchases. But finished manufactures, which go directly from the United States to the non-manufacturing sections of the world—South America, Asia, Oceania, Africa, and our North American neighbors—actually formed 37 per cent. of the exports of the country in the calendar year 1921, against only 31 per cent. in the fiscal year 1914, 29 per cent. in 1910, 24 per cent. in 1900, and 15 per cent. in 1890. Even at the greatly reduced prices of 1921 the total value of finished manufactures exported was $1,625,000,000, against only $725,000,000 in the fiscal year 1914, $500,000,000 in 1910, $332,000,000 in 1900, $133,000,000 in 1890, and $93,000,000 in 1880.

Hunter, Dulin & Co. have prepared, and are offering for distribution a booklet on the subject of "Bonds," which should prove of interest to all investors. This booklet contains examples of mistakes commonly made by inexperienced investors, with suggestions on their avoidance; and it contains in condensed form tables which are of value to every bond buyer.

One of the most prominent editors in California in writing the Manufacturer and Industrial News Bureau on the political outlook in the state says:

"We have a hard time ahead of us here in California, I am afraid, with this iniquitous water and power act and the damnable Non-Partisan League movement, to say nothing of the fool single-tax agitation that is going on the ballot again."

Not one of the proposed measures offers the people of the state any relief from increasing taxation, but on the contrary, the water and power act and the Non-Partisan League programme of state ownership of industries would undoubtedly within five years double the tax burden which the public is now paying.

California would become the mecca for office-seekers and tax-evaders. Incidentally it would become the graveyard of private enterprise, and new capital would shun the state as it has done in North Dakota.

The single-tax measure offers no tax relief; it would simply load total tax burdens onto land which is already taxed to confiscation point.

California's present condition is like a Sunday-school picnic compared to what conditions will be if any or all the socialistic propositions before the people are enacted.

San Francisco Municipal Railway, widely heralded as the most successfully operated municipal railways in the United States, shows a deficit on a 5-cent fare of $188,811 for the year ended June 30, 1921. Total revenues were $2,914,212. Operating expenses were $2,116,975; interest on funded debt, $224,453; reserve funds, $516,414; other fixed charges, $245,180; total, $3,103,024; deficit, $188,811.

Supposing this line had been required to pay some 5 per cent. of its gross earnings for taxes to maintain the state government (not to mention Federal taxes), as all private street railway lines in California must do; its deficit would have been $145,710 larger, or $334,521.

The public must pay, through additional personal tax levies, the $145,710 which the Municipal Railway is exempted from paying.

Some day, when the various forms of tax exemption now in existence are done away with, the tax burdens of the average citizen will be lightened as they should be.—Industrial News Bureau.

Following the strong demand of the past for bonds secured by adequate land values, Bradford, Weeden & Co. are offering a $250,000 issue of A. M. Mull Building first mortgage 7 per cent. bonds.

These bonds are secured by a first mortgage on real estate and improvements in the City of Sacramento valued at over $529,500. The real estate consists of two parcels, one located at Tenth and L Streets and the other consisting of nine acres of warehouse property on the Sacramento River water-front.

On the Tenth Street property an office and store building is to be erected. Owing to the great demand for office space in Sacramento, practically all the available space in the building has been leased, the State of California having contracted for over 40 per cent. of the area.

The bonds are issued in series, due from February 1, 1924 to 1937, inclusive, and are being sold at par to yield 7 per cent. Application has been made to have the issue made a legal investment for savings banks.

Henry L. Doherty & Co. are offering at 73 and interest $2,000,000 Ozark Power & Water Company first mortgage sinking fund 5 per cent. gold bonds, dated March 1, 1922, and maturing March 1, 1952. These bonds are a first mortgage on a hydro-electric generating station of 18,000 horsepower capacity, six sub-stations, and 200 miles of transmission and distributing lines. In 1921 the company sold 40,572,000 K.W.H. of current, serving 662 customers. The company has a long-

There is nothing new in this. In 1917 the whole railroad section of the market declined sharply, while the industrial stocks, led by Steel common, were making new high records. There were causes for the conflicting movements in 1921, just as there were in 1917. The coppers advanced last year because their previous decline had discounted the worst that could happen to them and because the

BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

The old saying that there is no end to the making of books is being vindicated to the hilt in the present outgushing of printed matter from the presses of the world. Never has there been such a freshet of books as this. Whether—to make the confusion of figures complete—the manna outweighs the hailstones in the literary downpour may be questioned, but the public seems to welcome it all impartially in their craving for information, and this is at least an assurance that the world is awake and thinking.

In any case the range of the book boom is all but universal in source and subject matter. It extends from Russia to Australia, and longitudinally from Greenland's icy mountains to India's coral strand, with every nation contributing. In Australia the publishing industry has even assumed a patriotic note. Authors' associations have been formed in Melbourne and Sydney to promote the interests of Australian literature, and to conduct a campaign against the importation of serial stories from abroad. A kind of ban on immigrant books. This principle might easily be developed to the point of regarding books as the sinews of the state. Publication might be made the basis of the census instead of population, and heated discussions could be held over the practicability of an intellectual birth control to retard the excessive fertility of literary creators. And it requires only a slight cast of the imagination to conceive the materialization of Swift's "Battle of the Books" on an extended scale.

There could be no more striking token of this new accent on the importance of literature than the celebration of Molière's tercentenary in Paris. When Lloyd George followed Briand to Paris recently, during the festival, the attention of the Parisians was torn for a moment between Molière and the national crisis, but soon returned to Molière with an apparent conviction that of the two he was the more important. Even the Pope has paid his tribute to profane literature by countenancing the burning of a few candles for the salvation of the great satirist's more immortal essence.

Hobart Ramsay writes from Paris, also, that the African author, René Maran, has won an enormous vogue in "Batouala," a tale of life among the people of French Central Africa. The book has been awarded the Prix Goncourt, and though the critics are more impressed by its brutality than its literary merits, its popularity may mean the inauguration of an African era in literature. It coincides in time, setting, and subject matter with G. Cyril Claridge's "The Wild Bush Tribes of Central Africa," and the two books are likely to prove the forerunners of a host of similar ones.

Another indicative straw in the running tide is the projected increase in the honorarium of the French Academicians from 1500 francs a year—the stipend accorded them since 1796—to the more respectable sum of 3000 francs, or about $250. This will at least aid the "immortals" in retaining their hold on this mortal coil long enough to insure their permanent immortality, and, as such things go in an industrial state, it is a handsome recognition of the importance of books and their writers.

In England, Sir James Barrie has been awarded the Order of Merit. The order is limited to twenty-four members, and includes five other writers besides Barrie: Lord Morley, Lord Bryce, Thomas Hardy, Sir George Trevelyan, and Arthur James Balfour. The selection of the Scottish author for the honor has aroused a good deal of criticism, not because he is a man of letters, but because it is doubted whether, among the writers of England, he represents the inevitable choice for the distinction. There seems to be a stereotyped process in this as in other political matters: the unreality of Barrie's work, and his touch of whimsical faerie, save him from offense to any one's political prejudices, and the government has evidently reasoned that as his elevation to a baronetcy several years ago was widely applauded, he would be a safe recipient for further honors. This controversy apart, however, there is a fresh tribute to the prestige of letters in the appointment, and that, at present, is the main fact of interest.

The authors of yesterday are also sharing in the revival. In the epidemic of publication the printing houses are laying feverish hands on every available literary remnant of the great dead, and among the posthumous collections one finds, of course, some new manuscripts of Stevenson. Here again certain critics (themselves authors, be it noted) have raised a question as to the wisdom of feeding the press in this impetuous fashion. A. N. M. writes in the Manchester Guardian:

"I see that there is to be another grand edition of Stevenson—the Vailima Edition—in which no less than six eminent publishing firms are joining. Mr. Lloyd Osbourne is the 'general editor,' and a great deal of new material is to be included. I daresay that much of it is the kind of thing that many authors leave in their desks when they die; they have been too indolent to destroy, and their executors are afraid of committing sacrilege, or, in the Hedda Gabler sense, murder. It would require a good nerve to burn an original, unpublished poem by Stevenson, even if you thought it rubbish, and it seems that the Vailima Edition is to give us about 150 new poems. Clearly one man couldn't burn 150. It would give him a life of hauntings and remorse. He would start at shadows, wondering whether, after all, there wasn't rather a good stanza in that 149th poem. And yet it would have been a beneficent act if somebody could have got hold of Shelley's 'Wandering Jew' in time and put it in the fire. It used to be said that there are two good lines in it, and when I was young and a member of the Shelley Society I used to search for them.

"But I am digressing. The question is Stevenson, and one division of it is whether he would really have liked all this old stuff to see the light. He can hardly blame us. Literary men know what to expect! If a genius dies with a lot of unpublished MSS. in his desk it is inevitable that they will be published. If he wanted to prevent it he should have burnt them, or, at the least, have left a conspicuous curse upon any one who did publish. There is something to be said, of course, for the final and definitive, for the accessible storehouse. The trouble is that finality is only an idea. I suppose that if demand persists we shall have a further edition, with more letters and poems, more sweepings, more contributions from the rag-bag. There is not very much harm in it, I daresay, and it is possible, of course, that matter you value has been missed. One feels that there must be about enough of Stevensoniana to go on with. I am ready to be excited if another 'Wrecker' or 'Kid-naped' can be unearthed, but I think that these new editions are not so much for me as for collectors, connoisseurs, scholars, fanatics, and Scotsmen generally. These are rallying finely, for though the edition will not be out till the end of this month it is already off the publishers' hands. Doubtless the booksellers are rapidly getting it off their hands."

But his principle reflection is that in this deluge of anthologies Henry James seems to have been rather neglected.

Not content with the posthumous publication of authentic literary remains, the publishers, E. P. Dutton & Co., have issued a book by Edward S. Martin, an essayist and poet, who employs a medium and automatic writing to transcribe the messages of William James from beyond the tomb, regarding some new "varieties of religious experience," put forth, not for its interest as a spiritist communication, but for its value as "a contribution to religious thought." Meanwhile Charles G. Norris' "Brass" runs to its twenty-fourth edition.

Clearly these are banyan days for the authors.

Notes of Books and Authors.

Mr. Doran, president of the George H. Doran Company, is in England arranging with British authors and publishers for a number of new and important books for spring and fall publication.

Hitherto unpublished chapters from Mark Twain's autobiography appear in the February issue of Harper's Magazine. There is an introductory note by Albert Bigelow Paine, Mark Twain's official biographer. "Selections which Mark Twain thought might appear with propriety during his lifetime were printed during 1906 and 1907," says Mr. Paine. "The greater portion of the manuscript, however, remains unpublished, and contains much of his choicest work." To the millions of Mark Twain lovers, these chapters will prove intensely interesting, for, as the author himself remarks in the preface of his autobiography, "What a wee little part of a person's life are his acts and his words! His real life is led in his head, and is known to none but himself. . . . Biographies are but the clothes and buttons of the man."

Margaret Belle Houston, the author of "The Witch Man," a tale of the Virginia mountains, is a granddaughter of General Sam Houston, commander of the Texas armies, hero of San Jacinto, twice president of Texas, United States senator from Texas, and governor of Texas.

Appropos of his new volume of essays, "The Latest Thing and Other Things," which the Harpers are publishing on February 1st, Alexander Black says: "As an editor I try to think of everybody, but as a writer I think of the other fellow who reads what I read, thinks what I think, feels what I feel. I write out of my heart to the imaginary folks who like what I like."

The January publications of Charles Scribner's Sons included "A Life of George Westinghouse," by Henry Prout, C.E., M.A., LL.D.; "The Flutter of the Goldleaf and Other Plays," written by Olive Tilford Dargan and Frederick Peterson; "Leaves of Grass," by Walt Whitman, an addition to the Modern Student's Library, and "Bible and Spade," by John P. Peters, Ph.D., Sc.D., D.D. The last book is a study of recent archaeological discoveries in the Holy Land and their application to the interpretation of certain passages of the Bible.

The Stephen French Whitman novel, "Sacrifice," which D. Appleton & Co. will soon publish, is reported to be written in a vein which has taken a distinct hold on the fiction of Europe and toward which a tendency is showing in this country. This is the so-called "romantic realism," of which "If Winter Comes" and the novels of the Frenchman, Paul Benoit, may be cited as distinguished examples. This realism, which borrows the wings of the romantic, bends to its uses such romantic hall-marks as literary style, and an emphasis laid on certain traits of character to stamp a man or woman as set apart for a fate larger than that normally meted out to those among whom they may live. In "Sacrifice" the central character, it is said, is a woman to whom comes a fate the unusual aspects of which are stressed by the author's brilliant style.

Mrs. Arthur Webster, whose "World Revolution" has just been issued in this country by Small, Maynard & Co., has recently lectured before the officers of the English War Office; the first time in history such an invitation has been tendered to a woman.

Dr. Maurice Francis Egan, former Ambassador to Denmark, in a special article in the New York Times declares that Stephen Graham's new book, "Europe—Whither Bound?" (Appleton), enables his readers to walk the streets of the European capitals as they are today.

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

Letters to Isabel.

Biography, and particularly autobiography, are the order of the day. Aud of the latter species there are many sorts. One of the most original variations has been achieved in a wholly delightful book called "Letters to Isabel," by Lord Shaw of Dunfermline. The interesting plan of this memoir is a series of letters to the author's daughter. Many autobiographies take the form of letters, but they are usually current documents. These letters were written long after the events they describe in the perspective that is usually associated with memoirs. But the form of letters gives the book a curious vitality that a reminiscent narrative would probably lack. It was a happy idea.

"Letters to Isabel" reflect the long life of Lord Shaw of Dunfermline, both in its political and private aspects. His sketches of the great men who were his friends and political allies or opponents—such men as Gladstone, Morley, Asher, Balfour, Carnegie, and many others—give the book an historical interest. But its chief charm is in the reconstruction of an age from a personal viewpoint that is so refreshing as is Lord Shaw's.

One of the most interesting pictures is Lord Shaw's sketch of the Edinburgh University of his youth and of the condition of student life at that time. One is reminded that college life was not always a four-year vacation.

"Letters to Isabel"—whose tragic romance is told us in an interesting preface by Annie Swan—is by far one of the most attractive of the reminiscent books with which we have been so deluged of late.

LETTERS TO ISABEL. By Lord Shaw of Dunfermline. New York: George H. Doran Company.

California Wild Flowers.

The subject of flowers, whether as a study or a literary theme, is always a fascinating one. Any discussion of flowers seems to borrow some of their charm. And wild flowers in particular intrigue one's interest. One of Maeterlinck's most delightful essays is that on how the flowers came to Europe. To the average reader, perhaps even to many flower lovers, it was surprising to learn that most of our flowers came from the East. Was Europe a flowerless continent before medieval traffic with the Orient; or have the indigenous flowers of Europe somehow been superseded by the importations?

A book that deals charmingly with Western wild flowers and their origins and habits is "Popular Studies of California Wild Flowers," by Bertha M. Rice and Roland Rice. The authors combine the advantages of thorough technical knowledge with an ability to array their facts attractively. Nothing could be further from the dryness usually associated with mammals. The authors, who are the directors of the annual State Wild Flower Exhibit, are enthusiastic about their study and their book is calculated to make others share their interest.

POPULAR STUDIES OF CALIFORNIA WILD FLOWERS. By Bertha M. Rice and Roland Rice. Privately printed in San Francisco; popular edition, $2.50; special edition, $6.

Honeymoon Dialogues.

Readers who enjoy the semi-epigrammatic style of "The Guide-Book to Women" may or may not rejoice to see another and a similar volume from its author's facile hand. "Honeymoon Dialogues" is simply more of the same sort of thing, with the possible qualification that here Mr. James' canvas is more limited. So possibly we should not blame him if each chapter is very much like the last. One has to admit though in extenuation of oneself that the last was pretty good, for one invariably keeps on reading till he has finished. Having finished, there is little doubt in one's mind that he might just as well have stopped at the end of the first chapter.

One use that we suggest "Honeymoon Dialogues" be put to is a subject of pink-tea conversation. If every one present has read the thing the tea will be sure to be a success, particularly if it is a mixed tea. No man can help chortling at the sex's foibles being nailed once for all, and quite mercilessly. No woman can sit quietly under the inquisition. For it must be admitted that Mr. James has a distinct gift of satire, which he has the further grace not to label. Altogether his or—we wonder—her talents are not small. It is to be hoped that they will be extended to fresh fields of derision.

HONEYMOON DIALOGUES. By James James. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $2.

The Triumph of the Egg.

Mr. Sherwood Anderson's "The Triumph of the Egg" allies him with a group of modern American fictionists who have consecrated themselves to the difficult task of making Middle Western Americans talk and act like Russians. The effort has been aggravated in Mr. Anderson's case by the ill-advised remark of some critic that he "depicts life in the Middle West as Dostoevsky pictured the many-colored life of Russia, with almost as wonderful a touch of genius, and with a more concentrated and daring skill." Under the stimulus of this praise, Mr. Anderson pictures a Middle West that may resemble the interior of Russia, but that only bears a random likeness to any section of the United States. His work has this glint of justification, that people who live in the interior of continents are usually more solemn and introspective than their compatriots on the seaboard. But pessimism and fatalism are not characteristic of any part of America, and an attempt to portray the Middle West in these hues is a misrepresentation.

The stories in the present volume are very skilfully contrived; they are full of memorable bits of observation, and they are all tintured with the sentiment that entitles the first tale in the collection: "I Want to Know Why." This curiosity is the mark of every significant writer, and of every reasoning man. But even Middle Westerners have their moments of surcease from pallid and lank-haired speculation about the dullness of Illinois, and whither we are tending. Mr. Anderson attempts to outdo the Russians in this melancholy questioning, and extinguishes even the fugitive gleam of laughter that sometimes pierces through the gloom of Eurasian fiction. Since it can be done with small risk of physical injury, he might eradicate some of the mopishness from his otherwise excellent style by occasionally exploding a Russian bomb under his chair.

THE TRIUMPH OF THE EGG. By Sherwood Anderson. New York: B. W. Huebsch Company.

Through the Torii.

As regards limpidity and delicacy of style, no English writer has realized the possibilities of his tongue more completely than a writer who was, in race and tradition, at the antipodes to England. The secret of his power is doubtless that he has adapted the exuberant Anglo-Saxon language to the more austere and pellucid artistic forms of Japan. The result is a kind of grace that one glimpses only in the best English translation of classic Grecian verse. "Through the Torii" is a collection of prose essays, written in a prose, however, that flows in smooth and poetic cadences, and deals in a semi-religious mood with some of the mystical undercurrents of Eastern and Western life, art, and thought. Noguchi's wide acquaintance with English literature and culture (and Irish, too, it should be added) enables him to intersperse his essays on the spirit of East and West with enlightening comments on such subjects of controversy as Yeats and Wilde. Here he shows a breadth and freshness of perception that can only be attained through a far perspective, and that goes far toward explaining the magic of Lafcadio Hearn. A Japanese who can express himself with perfect articulateness in English, and who is familiar at first hand with English life, but who remains essentially an Oriental, is a critic with no ordinary claim to a hearing, and recent events give the works of Noguchi an additional and renewed interest.

The Glory That Was Greece.

In "The Glory That Was Greece" Mr. J. C. Stobart offers an artistic and literary history of Hellenic culture, with profuse photographic illustrations of the statuary and architecture of the various periods, and several excellent studies of Greek landscape. The work is novel in the sense that it gives an ordered, comprehensive, and authoritative survey of a subject that has hitherto been treated very fully, but in a specialized and piecemeal fashion. Another innovation is Mr. Stobart's attempt to link up the prehistoric culture of Greece with that of the classical periods, and his reproduction, in this connection, of models recently added to the Ashmolean Museum at Oxford and the British Museum from the artistic treasures of Crete and Mycenae, and of photographs of bas-reliefs from the newly-discovered "Ludovisi Throne," which have been acquired by the Boston Museum of Fine Arts.

MOLIÈRE.

The great comic dramatist of France, the three-hundredth anniversary of whose birth is celebrated this year, was in the highest as well as in the deepest sense a realist. He allied himself with the popular theatre of his day which he transcended and also immortalized, not by the grace and ardor of his poetry, nor by anything that has to do with a high beauty or distinction of form, but by his tireless pursuit of truth and right reason and by his intrepid hostility to sham and cant.

The young advocate of twenty-one who fled from the paternal feshpots and the futile intricacies of the law to join the poor players of the Illustre Théâtre may not yet have been clearly conscious of the passion that was to rule his life. But the motive for that passion in experience is definitely furnished by the actions and the character of the vivid father in the case. Molière's father was upholsterer-in-ordinary to Louis XIII. He gave his son a gentleman's education, hoping, perhaps, for another and vicarious bit of social advancement. His disappointment made him rancorous. He refused to bail out of a debtor's prison the treasurer of his son's company and showed signs of relenting only when the author of "L'Etourdi" and "Le Débit amoureux" had won the plaudits of the crowd and the favor of a prince of the blood. It is not difficult to imagine in what circles the young Molière saw with amusement and not without bitterness Orgon and Tartuffe and Mme. Pernelle, Jourdain and Argan and Harpagon—all the silly or canting crew.

He became, at all events, a determined lover of that "perfect reason that flees from all extremes," one who saw in simple, undeviating sincerity "something that is in its own nature noble and heroic," and hated nothing so profoundly as that "privileged vice of hypocrisy which closes the world's lips and enjoys the repose of a sovereign impunity." He felt it to be his business to destroy that impunity in the worlds of quackery and of social and religious pretense. And the depths and urgency of that feeling is attested by the note of a passion not less than tragic which quivers in "Le Misanthrope" and "Le Tartuffe."

It is by virtue of his spirit that Molière is great rather than by virtue of his form. He has a sober eloquence in his prose and often a tingling reality; his thoroughly pedestrian verse rises to occasional brilliance as in the compact and telling "characters" of the second act of "Le Misanthrope"; more often it is a fetter, and a fetter consciously worn. Nor do those critics serve his fame who seek to make an excuse or even an exemplar of the primitive and arbitrary structure that belonged to his age rather than to himself, and to subordinate the great liberating spirit to the seventeenth-century dramaturgist.

He does not need false praise. "He represents humanity in its uncorrupted form," said Goethe. "Nothing about him is contorted or crippled." It is the truth of this observation that justifies and renders permanent the beautiful and final panegyric of Sainte-Beuve: "To love Molière is to be forever cured, not only of base and infamous hypocrisy, but of all fanaticism and intolerance; it is to be equally guarded against making an idol of man or despising him; it is to be the foe of mannerism and pedantry and to love in others and in oneself the fundamental health and rectitude of the mind."—The Nation.

"To show the white feather" is a phrase that has survived cock-fighting days. A thoroughbred gamecock has only red and black feathers. A cross-breed bird is known by a white feather in his tail. As the slightest impurity of strain was said to destroy the bird's fighting spirit, the plume was adopted to show lack of pluck among men.

DE COURVILLE'S "LONDON FOLLIES."

San Franciscans, when they learned of this London attraction coming our way, have been feeling curious to compare London attractions of this kind with American ones; but really the most marked difference lies in the Englishness of the company. The show is not so handsomely put on as an American first-class one generally is, but they have the usual line of variously head-gear'd girl costumes, set off with high-colored drops sensationally patterned. There is the usual contingent of girls, a couple of comedians—Harry Tate acting as the chief one—two women soloists, comical vaudeville and burlesque acts, the usual effectively costumed East Indian interlude, and a very fine male dancer. In fact "London Follies" seems to be modeled on American shows of the kind, if American "Follies" are not modeled on London ones, so complete is the resemblance between them. Our American producers spend more money on their shows, our girls are prettier, our comedy—leaving out Harry Tate's—is funnier, and there is more snap to the American performance.

The London Follies girls are very young and are evidently selected for slimmess, plus, no doubt, some kind of a voice, although the troupe does not distinguish itself by its vocalism. A funny thing: these English chorus girls do not begin to make up as do their American cousins. They are not only sparing with rouge, but in costumes in which their young backs and shoulders were plentifully displayed they looked as if they hadn't even powdered those lavishly displayed areas.

The first thing I was conscious of enjoying was the English accent of Billie Holland, the Manager. (I noticed, by the way, that this actor shares with American players the habit of dropping the h's—don't be alarmed, Billie; I don't mean in the way that, in England, damns a person beyond recall; no, I mean the h's in where, why, when, etc.) But the English accent of the general company did not particularly obtrude itself.

The bright, particular star of the company is, of course, Harry Tate. I thought at first when the big fellow came in and gave a patter song in musical-comedy style that he was not going to be so very funny. But you just wait until he has you rocking in your seat during the well-known scene on the links. There were three important roles, that of Harry Tate, that played by Harry Beasley—who is a most life-like imitation of a starveling from the slum quarters—and a piece of tissue paper which really, aided by Harry Tate and his golf stick, showed uncanny intelligence. The house screamed during this interlude; every one of us, whether or not we played golf; but one could easily detect the more particularly personal note in the appreciation of the golf players.

Harry Tate's comedy is that of the big, puffy, imposing, paunchy, choleric man of the world. He expresses comedy readily by look and attitude, without overdoing it. I found myself unconsciously regarding him, on account of a kind of authoritative note in his personality, as if he owned the show, but, as it happens, it is under his direction.

The soloists are only fair singers. The handsomest costumes are lavished on Lillian Cales, a young lady with an English cast of countenance, but who has learned a trick or two from Americans, since, unlike the chorus girls, she is well whitened in American style. Lillian is tall, and fair, and statuesque, and sings in a somewhat wavering soprano. The management blows itself on her costumes, since she is a sort of head show girl.

Connie Browning is shorter, and her voice inclines to mezzo. The whole company, mis-calculating the size of the Columbia auditorium, speaks at the top of its voice, but Connie, like Abou Ben Adhem, led all the rest, for she is stage conscience incarnate.

There is no attempt at continuity in the show. There is a playlet in the middle of it, which amuses the audience, and several beauty interludes, as "The Rainbow of Flowers" and "In Versailles."

"Beauty, you say. Are the girls pretty?" is asked. Well, not nearly as pretty as ours. They are probably recruited from the lower classes in London; small shopgirls and the like. The girls in the company have a naive way of smiling at the familiar faces in the orchestra—perhaps they are ogling them—and regarding the audience with childlike curiosity. Their movements are stamped by girlish gaucherie.

Besides the in-between acts already mentioned, there was a take-off on melodrama—not as funny as it might be—and some violin playing by Henri Rosen, who was nervous in his Versailles act and played off pitch, but who, disguised as a tramp, recovered his confidence and redeemed himself.

The motor-car sale scene is very carefully worked up, and is amusing, but not as much so as the golf scene. Occasionally a mild attempt at a naughty joke is made. But intrinsic racial respectability of British sentiment makes it rebound harmlessly. And wasn't that a British touch in the money-borrowing scene when Dean Tate is compelled, after getting the best of an intending borrower, to explain to the audience what was perfectly obvious.

The devotees of this line of attraction will probably have their full enjoyment because of the variety in the show, the costumed pageantry to display the girls—which happens three or four times—the excellent dancing of W. Wania, who is a fine whirler and a first-class leaper à la Mordkin, the usual line of melodies, and, most of all, the comedy of Harry Tate. There were lots of Britons there, but plenty of Americans, too, even although they were obliged, for the nonce, to renounce jokes of a strictly American character; so the show is drawing all right.

THEATRICAL NOTES.

The Theatre Guild, in its artistic efforts to make the public acquainted with drama that is banned in the commercial theatres, recently put on Tolstoy's "Powers of Darkness," and in January they tried Andreyev's "He Who Gets Slapped."

Andreyev is a symbolist, and symbolism is always more or less of a puzzle. Either the spectator should confine himself to the symbolism without the drama, or the drama without the symbolism, in a symbolical play. For the two together make a fearfully trying tax on the understanding. On the whole the best method is to take the play as straight drama while at the theatre and dig out the symbolism after you get home.

It is noticeable that press comments on Andreyev's play contain many interrogatories, for he is a most baffling symbolist. In his two profoundly symbolical plays, "The Black Mask" and "The Life of Man," which show how vainly man contends against inexorable destiny, there are passages among whose rolling vapors the reader wanders in thick darkness.

"He Who Gets Slapped" has probably reached the stage because it represents the symbolism of circus life. Therefore in the color and glitter of its changeable aspects the symbolism-evader may surrender himself to the drama, and let the symbolism gradually percolate, if it will; although since Andreyev the obscure is responsible for it it probably won't. The critics commend the production and the acting at the Garrick—which is the habitat of the Theatre Guild—and say that the intelligentsia ought to see it. But a lack of inner enthusiasm is evident in their—some of them, anyway—frankly puzzled comments. For the fact is that Andreyev as a dramatist is too incomprehensible for common, everyday humanity, and is better read than acted.

Although retired from the stage, Maude Adams, who was always interested in the mechanics of stage lighting, is still in touch with the mimic world, through this same active interest. Rumor has it that in a laboratory she has set up in Schenectady she is cooperating with the General Electric Company—one of the greatest electrical works in the world—in experimental tests on colored pictures. The lady, however, prefers to carry on her work without any white light of publicity being thrown on it from the outside; probably because, as her electrical engineer points out, her work is purely research work.

Miss Adams has always evinced considerable grasp on the problems of stage lighting, and has had many of her apparently impracticable ideas proved useful and possible. The value of Miss Adams' present research is greatly strengthened by her immense experience and knowledge of stagecraft employed under the best auspices, by her precaution of surrounding herself with scientific experts, and by her liberal use of her great wealth in her undertakings. No doubt the public, already partially informed, would be surprised to learn the value and the practical results of the many experiments she tried with light and color when she was on the stage. And such being the case, the large motion-picture concerns have shown their keen interest by sending emissaries to spy on her work at Schenectady; or so it is rumored.

The interest evinced by San Franciscans in the Russian Grand Opera Company, which is now on tour, is beginning to be reflected in some degree by opera lovers in other sections of the country, for inquiries have already been addressed to this city as to their route.

Their success in attracting audiences, if it continues, will probably attract the attention of the Art Theatre of Moscow, the members of which are now traveling through such of the towns of Russia and the Balkan cities as are in a condition to patronize the art of the stage. It is rumored that when these engagements are completed the company will direct their way to America, accompanied by the famous directors of the Art Theatre, who will bring along with them scenery and appointments.

Nothing definite is known, but it is rumored that the Theatre Guild is the organization which is negotiating for what should prove a most momentous event in the American theatrical world.

The Theatre Guild, the lineal successor of the Washington Square Players, who were obliged to disband during the war, is an organization of professionals who wish to help on stage art by giving it favorable opportunities in a non-commercial theatre.

The Theatre Guild gave its first play—which was a failure—in 1918. Its second—"John Ferguson"—made a great success, and set it on its feet. It is kept going financially by means of its system of having subscribers who pledge themselves to attend every production of the season; these season seats being sold at a reasonable reduction. The financial returns of the Guild are not devoted to personal profit. The necessary salaries paid are small, and all financial profit goes into new productions.

The Guild has its regular company, but also engages guest players of high standing for some of the runs. In fact, the Theatre Guild, from present indications, offers an example of successful cooperation of professionals, some of them players, some of them dramatists, but all of the artistic fraternity.

The New York critics evidently felt a little dubious when they first heard of Calvé's present American tour at the age of fifty-seven. But Calvé had but to sing in order to conquer, and the grateful music critics are throwing innumerable bouquets at her feet. Some are retrospective in character, recalling past ecstasies that her art had yielded them. But they do not need to revert to the past to acclaim her art. "She knows and she has always known how to sing," says Finck of the Evening Post, "and there is no reason why she should not make several more American tours." This reviewer recalls the dramatic quality in certain of her rôles as "nothing short of miraculous" while Henderson of the Herald declares that her art, "the old art that Marchesi taught," is known to but few living singers.

The last time Calvé was in San Francisco was during the war, when she was on a vaudeville circuit. She appeared at our local Orpheum, and there was some disturbance, a prolonged interruption to the artist's song. Nobody quite knew whether or not it was due to some hostile feeling in Teutonic zealots in the audience. But I shall not soon forget the look in the diva's face; that mingling of pained feeling and aroused pride. However, whatever the motive behind the interruption, it was speedily silenced, and the singer tacitly assured that she had her audience with her. But the reminiscence makes one wonder if she will wish to revisit a city where she had such a disagreeable experience.

JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

AN EXPOSITOR.

People who are neither philosophers nor mathematicians—most of us, in other words—should not expect to understand the relativity theory without going through the long course of study that has carried a few industrious persons through difficult ascents to the heights where Dr. Einstein and other such climbers have arrived (says the New York Times). When it was announced that only about a dozen people in the world were capable of comprehending relativity in its new sense, there was an almost general resentment, as if some charge of stupidity or ignorance had been made against almost everybody. That was curious because nobody hesitates to admit that there are many things in science he does not know, or that the limit of his mathematical knowledge is surpassed far below the very loftiest of mathematical domains.

Not a few would-be popularizers of the Einstein theory have written for the magazines and newspapers what they claimed were explanations of them, understandable by ordinarily intelligent and educated folk. But the thing simply can not be done, any more than conic sections or the differential calculus can be made clear to boys and girls in the grammar school. In spite of all that, however, it is possible for the ordinarily intelligent and educated to get a correct notion of the relativity theories—of what they are and what they are about—from an expositor who, besides being one of the favored dozen, also has the power of lucid expression.

Such an expositor is Charles P. Steinmetz, and he has contributed to the February Harper's an article which in a few admirably written and beautifully simple pages really does what so many other writers vainly have tried to do. A reading of the article will not make anybody the thirteenth underlander of Dr. Einstein, but it will enable anybody really interested and capable of doing a little hard thinking to say, "Yes, I see what the theory is and how it changes the older conceptions of time, space, and matter."

Dr. Steinmetz' article deserves consideration for another reason. It is in itself an illustration of the new repeat which "practical" men now have for science, and even for what is called "pure" science.

This eminent man does his work of thought and research, not under the auspices of an endowed university that can afford to let him hunt for truth, regardless of whether what he finds is or is not an immediate help toward making a living. Instead, he is on the staff of an industrial organization, a manufacturing corporation that seeks profits on its products as eagerly as any other of its kind. It, too, not only thinks, but knows, that it can afford to put its laboratories and its resources at the command of a philosopher-mathematician. A few other like organizations have come to realize that between theory and practice there is no such gulf as was believed to exist by all the manufacturers of another, not very remote, day.

The Germans were the first fully to appreciate the service that science could render to business, and they had their reward in such a rapid growth of trade as never was seen in any other country. That they tried to hurry it by resort to an exactly opposite method—the oldest and most barbarous of all—says a lot about Germans, but nothing at all about science. For their mistake, as for their wisdom, they had their reward.

The Columbia Theatre.

David Warfield will appear, beginning Monday, February 20th, for an engagement of two weeks, at the Columbia Theatre, in "The Return of Peter Grimm," in the presentation of which he is supported by the same company that lately appeared at the Belasco Theatre, New York, and which includes in its membership nearly all of the important players who took part in the original production of the drama eleven years ago.

David Belasco, who is both author and producer of "The Return of Peter Grimm," has brought to his creation, not only his finest technical skill, but sympathy and human understanding as well. The theme of the play is one of vital interest to the public mind of the day, but the success of "The Return of Peter Grimm" is due not so much to its fascinating speculations in the realms of the supernatural as to the fact that it is primarily an intense drama of human emotions.

The company surrounding Mr. Warfield includes Marie Bates, Miriam Doyle, Marie Reichardt, Joseph Brennan, John Sainpolis, George Wellington, William Boag, John F. Webber, Edwin Dupont, and David Malcom.

The final presentation of the Albert de Courville "London Follies" will take place at the Columbia Theatre this Sunday night, February 19th. The revue of revues has made a big hit here.

The Maitland Playhouse.

"A Night Off," that world-famous comedy, translated by Austin Daly and produced, as theatre-goers will remember, by a cast including some of the best stars of the stage, will be revived at the Maitland Playhouse for the week commencing with the Monday night performance.

In the Daly company were such well-known stage folk as Otis Skinner, John Drew, Jimmy Lewis, and Ada Rehan. Daly always had a keen sense of humor and his workmanship in "A Night Off" has made this comedy one that will never be forgotten. Arthur Maitland has made additions to his company in order to present the Daly performance in the fashion that it demands.

A. A. Milne's "A Lucky One," a first performance in any country, by the way, which is being given this week, has been pronounced by the critics as altogether delightful. "A Lucky One" closes with the Saturday matinee and evening performance.

The Orpheum.

The screen and the stage have both contributed in making up the partnership of Claire Whitney and Robert Emmett Keane. Besides the qualities that photograph well, Miss Whitney has the necessary attributes for a prominent position on the stage—appearance, a sense of humor, acting ability, and a pleasantly expressive voice. Robert Emmett Keane is recognized as one of the best and funniest comedians on the stage. Miss Whitney and Mr. Keane are presenting a skit called "The Gossipy Sex," a humorous dramatization of the Gossip. Grudy.

Tom Patricola is not the common or ordinary garden variety of fool. His foolery is of the most artistic type. This season his fair feminine associate is Irene Delroy. Their act is said to be a sure-fire hit.

Classic dancing in America developed rapidly and today the native descriptive dancer holds her own throughout the world. La Bernicia is one of the exponents of choreographic dancing to bring America to the fore in this particular art. She is said to be one of the youngest of American prima ballerinas.

Harry Howard has brought forth a decided novelty in his spectacular exhibition of musical Shetlands and terriers. The ponies are little beauties and remarkably trained. The dogs, too, are remarkably clever.

Boyce Combe is a vaudevillian who believes in good, clean, wholesome fun. He has a pleasant personality and an ingratiating manner. His singing and chatting is quite as popular in England as in America.

Leo Flanders and Genevieve Butler, in one of the cleverest singing and piano acts seen thus far the current season, present "A Vaudeville Concert."

The Leo Zarrell duo execute a series of astounding and daring feats. These are performed with remarkable ease and sangfroid.

Godowsky Coming Next Month.

Leopold Godowsky, the pianist, will be heard here in recitals on Tuesday night, March 21st, and Sunday afternoon, March 26th, at the Scottish Rite Auditorium, under the local management of Frank W. Healy. Godowsky in the fall of this year will start on an extensive concert trip through the Far East, his itinerary including appearances in Japan, China, and India. Mr. Godowsky's tour includes countries which receive relatively few visits from great musicians.

Kreisler Coming in April.

Fritz Kreisler comes to San Francisco on Sunday afternoon (Easter Sunday), April 16th, for his only concert in Northern California, playing at the Exposition Auditorium under the local management of Frank W. Healy.

John McCormack.

At John McCormack's express wish Mr. Frank W. Healy, his local manager, has postponed the Irish tenor's two concerts heretofore announced in April to Wednesday night, November 1st, and Sunday afternoon, November 12th, at the Exposition Auditorium. Here is McCormack's telegram to Mr. Healy: "Thank you, friend Frank Healy, for postponing my San Francisco concerts. I have always sung in your great city at the end of the season, but I want to open my season of 1922-23 in the great West in I hope my best voice and with whatever of new music I may find on my travels next summer. Best regards to you and all my San Francisco friends."

Ethel Barrymore in "Déclasseé" will follow David Warfield at the Columbia Theatre two weeks hence.

"Transmutation of the Elements."

The fifth of the present series of free popular lectures under the auspices of the Astronomical Society of the Pacific will be given at Native Sons' Hall on Friday, February 17th, at 8 p. m., by Dr. Gilbert N. Lewis, dean of the College of Chemistry at Berkeley. His subject will be "Chemistry in the Service of Astronomy," and will touch upon the possible evolution and transmutation of the elements as indicated in the chemical laboratory and in the study of the stars. The lecture, which will be illustrated, will be open to the public.

EMERGENCY HISTORIANS.

New York is extremely jealous of any relic of its past (says the New York Times). In no other city in the country is the search for historic relics probably so well organized. Let a discovery of historic significance be made in the city or its vicinity and trained experts will be hurried to the scene with astonishing promptness. A group of specialists in various lines of historical research is constantly held in readiness to respond to such calls, which is as efficient in its way as the fire department.

New York is so crowded and the movement of life so rapid that heroic measures must often be taken to guard relics of the past. It is a common occurrence, for instance, for workmen in digging the foundations in the Wall Street section, where building is naturally pushed at top speed. It would be obviously impossible to hold up work on a busy street for any length of time to enable antiquarians to visit the spot and make their observations. Should some relic of old New York be unearthed, for instance a wall or foundation, it is of the utmost importance that experts should investigate at once. In a few hours the relic will be destroyed forever.

The trained experts who are prepared to respond to an emergency call of this kind are known as the Field Exploration Committee of the New York Historical Society. This committee, of which William L. Calver is chairman, includes six members, who have in turn elected four associates. In this group will be found experts in various phases of historical research—engineers and artists who can pass judgment intelligently upon any problem which may arise. During several years of service the committee has rendered invaluable assistance to the cause of historic preservation and investigation.

The New York Historical Society is constantly appealed to to furnish information and render assistance in problems of historical research. The volume of such services in the course of a year is astonishing. When a discovery of some interesting relic is made the chances are that some one who observes it will communicate with the society. If the find be important and is in danger the news may be telephoned to the society. As a rule such societies move deliberately, and it might be expected that days or weeks would pass before action was taken. But the Field Exploration Committee permits no grass to grow under its feet. If the case be urgent one or more of its experts are summoned by telephone and hurried to the scene of the discovery.

One of the most valuable services of the committee has been in unearthing the large hut camp of the Revolution near upper Broadway. A heavy rain once washed out some soldiers' buttons and other relics, and news of the discovery reached the committee. The work was intelligently and promptly planned, with surprising results.

The position of the huts of the old camp was first determined by probing the earth by means of a long steel rod. When the rod met resistance at a depth of three or four feet it was assumed that the stone or brick flooring of the hut had been struck and excavations commenced. The search disclosed a well-preserved fireplace far below the surface, with parts of the kettle and kitchen utensils and other relics of the life of the camp. The search proceeded slowly until two other camps had been unearthed, which showed the distance which separated them. The huts were found to have been regularly laid out, thus making it easy to locate the sites of other huts. More than fifty hut sites were unearthed in this way.

The relics obtained have made it possible to reconstruct the life of the old camp in detail. Thousands of buttons were found which served to identify the presence of some fifty British and Hessian regiments, which were once camped on Manhattan Island near the present line of Broadway. These discoveries establish the fact, generally disregarded, that the British sent many of their crack regiments to America and that more than 60,000 troops were quartered from time to time on Manhattan Island.

The committee has been called to explore the sites of many ancient dwellings, and from their discoveries have added invaluable information to our knowledge of the life of early times. The cellars and ash heaps have been excavated and carefully sifted, revealing the castaway debris of family life. In one of these investigations in the Bronx no less than eighty-seven coins were found, all bearing dates earlier than 1787. A study of these coins established the fact that New York, during and before the Revolution, carried on its affairs with an immensely assorted variety of coins from many nations, even including Arabia.

The British coins of the period, especially the silver, were heavier than those of other countries, and the thrifty New Yorker was in the habit of taking all the heavy coins he could find and handing out the lighter foreign coins. Many of the pieces discovered show that new dies had been struck upon designs only partially defaced. These searches show that the families of old New York were especially rich in chinaware and pottery of the best European makes.

Much original work has been done in the field of Indian exploration on Manhattan Island and its general vicinity. In the vicinity of upper Manhattan a dozen authentic Indian burial grounds have been located, and ceremonial pieces of pottery, tools, and weapons have been unearthed. Some of the pottery discovered is especially valuable. From these searches it has been possible for the first time to trace the original Indian trails of New York. At One Hundred and Fourteenth Street a large Iroquois Indian pottery vessel, one of the largest ever found in the East, was unearthed in perfect condition. During the opening of Two Hundred and Thirty-First Street west of Broadway a large Indian pot was discovered, which is unique among such discoveries.

The committee plans to enlist other workers who will search in the localities of their homes and be available for calls for emergency work. It is intended to secure those interested in the history of New York who, being familiar with various localities, will contribute to the effective operation of the committee.

It seems nothing short of providential that ex-Postmaster-General Hays has taken over the destiny of the movies. He is to humanize them, we are told. Not that we thought the movies were lacking in the particular quality implied. Rather, it seems to have been their forte. But possibly Mr. Hays' humanizing is not to be of another order. Humanizing may not be the right word, either. The movies certainly do not seem to need any promotion of natural instincts, impulses, or passions. Mr. Hays' admirers who claim that he will humanize the movies really mean that he is going to conventionalize them and reduce them to terms understood by the rest of us common mortals, who, for the most part, do not dare to be human. Mr. Hays is going to domesticate the movies. We can look hopefully forward to the time when a child need not blush for its parent's guileless presence at the cinema show. There are other reforms that we should like to see Mr. Hays perpetuate. But perhaps they are outside his jurisdiction. After all, we doubt if the real comptroller of the destinies of the movies is at all identical with a domesticating lawyer from Indiana. We suspect the fate of movie affairs is decided in a more hectic clime.

London doctors are advising women to smoke cigars. That is, if they must smoke they advise cigars as the lesser evil. And Englishwomen are smoking them, made of the finest inside Havana leaf, we are told. The new fad, along with the lesser novelty of pipe smoking, must be a boon to the conservative Englishwoman, who is now free to puff a cigarette and look sufficiently passé to be proper. One recalls the lady in the Pinero play who thought it such a beastly bore that smoking was going out. In her unenlightened and truly old-fashioned era the successors to the cigarette had not yet been dreamt of. We may rejoice now for the sake of her prototypes, who may still smoke and be smart. And we also rejoice for the not-quite-so-smart lady who may now smoke and still eschew smartness. Ours is truly a great era, in some respects. But, alas, even we are not exempt from natural laws, one of the most natural of which is that when anything from a new tint of hair to a new skirt altitude becomes popular, trite, and familiar, it ceases to be smart. As far as tobacco and its usage is concerned there is only one further stage. A forward-looking writer has already remarked that that, too, will be adopted by the powerful sex, when jewelers begin turning out jeweled and enameled cuspidors. We can only fervently hope that the reign of the pipette and cigar will be long. Meanwhile the old-fashioned woman is having her fling. It is said that Queen Mary, bulwark of English conservatism that she is, has now adopted the after-dinner cigarette.

We have often been puzzled by novels in which a heroine who is pictured as the last word in sweetness and truth suffers under the tyranny of parents who are hopelessly selfish and sordid. No such grafting of roses on thistles is to be found in nature, and one is surprised to find, in fiction, that the loveliest human fruit can grow on the most malignant stems. How can these paragons of girlhood have unworthy parents? When we communicated this perplexity to a thoughtful friend, he replied rather cryptically, "Give them time," meaning that at the same stage of maturity the daughters would closely resemble their parents. If this is true, any criticism of one's ancestors is apt to prove a boomerang kind of diversion. Professor Roswell H. Johnson, a eugenical authority of the University of Pittsburg, has recently expressed a similar opinion. He advises the young man who is choosing a mate to "study her mother, not forgetting her father." In this crystal the suitor can foresee, not only to what strange contours the fairy form of his beloved may in time be transmuted, but what seedlings of kindness or misanthropy, of gentleness and spite, lie latent in her ripening breast. Such a study will disclose many flaws where beauty seems to be, and beauty where there seems to be none. Let not Professor Johnson imagine, however, that any such consideration will affect the zeal of the young man determined to be married. Mother's embonpoint and father's reputation in Sing Sing are among the obstacles at which love laughs.

Not very long ago, any Malvolio was safe in warning the youth against "wine, women, and song." No woman thought of raising a voice in protest—probably because at that time the seductions with which she was classed were thought to be dangerous rather than disreputable. But now that a thirst and a desire to sing are looked on with such dark disfavor, she declines to be associated with either. The implied tribute to her intoxicating charm leaves her quite unmoved. At a recent conference of educational associations Sir R. Baden Powell quoted a passage from one of his books in which he had warned boys "to avoid certain rocks—horses, wine, women, and highbrows." One of his countrywomen promptly censured him for the "pernicious suggestion that women are rocks, or that they can be classed with animals and alcohol." The term "highbrows" apparently includes all the arts, but since the elders have not yet determined to prohibit these, the lady contented herself with a moody silence over the charge of being artistic. The wicked world, however, hastens to assure her that she is "a rock in a weary land," and that it will not permit her sex to be prohibited along with the other delights of life.

Passion Play

Bennett's Travel Bureau states that, according to the present outlook, tourist travel to Europe will be very heavy during the coming summer. One of the special attractions is the Passion Play which is held at Oberammergau every tenth year, and in this connection it might be mentioned that Anton Lang, the Christus in 1900 and 1910, will assume the same rôle in the play of 1922. The dates of the chief performances of the Passion Play are: May 14th, 21st, 25th, 28th, June 4th, 11th, 18th, 25th, 29th, July 2d, 9th, 16th, 19th, 23d, 26th, 30th, August 2d, 6th, 9th, 13th, 15th, 20th, 23d, 27th, 30th, September 3d, 10th, 17th, 24th.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

When the Duke of Wellington first went to the court of Louis the Eighteenth, the French marshals whom he had defeated turned their backs upon him. The king apologized for their rudeness. "Never mind, your majesty," replied Wellington; "they have got into the habit, and they can't get out of it."

On one of Queen Victoria's earliest visits to London, she observed to her friend, the then Earl of Albemarle: "I wonder if my good people of London are as glad to see me as I am to see them." He pointed to the letters V. R. woven into the decorations, and said: "Your majesty can see their loyal cockney answer, 'Ve are.'"

A teacher of the primary room of a public school became nervous over the restlessness and noise her pupils were making, and endeavored to stop it by suggesting: "Now, let's be quiet for just a moment, so quiet that we could hear a pin drop." After a few minutes of peace in the room, an impatient youngster in the rear of the room shouted: "Well, let 'er drop!"

During the trial of a case in a Boston court it became necessary to call to the witness stand a lady's maid. "Where were you at 6:45 on the evening in question?" was the first query put to her by the examining counsel. "Dressing the hair of madame," was the response. "Now," said the attorney, very solemnly, with uplifted finger, "think very carefully before you answer. Was or was not your mistress in the room at that time?"

A very stout man mounted the scales in a downtown drug store, and dropped a penny in the slot. There was some wait, and the clanking and rattling of the inward of the contraption, and the pointer finally came to a rest somewhere not far from the 300 mark. There was an unseen witness to the ceremony, and, as the fat man woefully contemplated the result, the voice of a wee, small boy piped up from behind him: "Say, mister, how many times did it go around?"

He was lost in the wilds of Connemara, and after being bogged several times arrived outside a cabin at 2 a. m., wet and shivering. He tapped several times at the door, and at last a shutter was raised and a head protruded. "What is all the noise about?" asked the owner of the protruding head. "I'm lost," explained the wanderer, "and want to stay here all night." "Well, why d'ye wake me up?" retorted Pat, as he prepared to bang the window. "Ye can stay a month if ye loike!"

An old road-mender sat on the shafts of his wheelbarrow, proudly surveying the few yards of the country lane he had swept and garnished in his day's work. The sun shone, the robin that shared his crust of bread sang to him blithely, but there was still another good reason why his weather-beaten, rugged old face wore a look of good content. "I be a-going to be married, sir," was the amazing confession he made to us, as we passed the time of day. "And I be happy to say, sir," he added, "that I be a-going to be married with the full consent of all the childer, on both sides."

Thomas Lamont said at a dinner at Williams College during the sessions of the Institute of Politics: "Let us admit that some political institutions, some governmental ideas, are as absurd as the hired man. 'Gosh, what a turn I just had,' said the hired man to the cook. 'In passin' the hog pen I seen the boss hangin' from a beam. Gosh, it fair turned my stomach.' 'But, Peleg, you cut him down, of course?' gasped the cook. 'My goodness, Peleg, you don't say you didn't cut him down!' 'Wall, I didn't,' grunted the hired man. 'Oh, why didn't you?' 'Cause he wasn't dead yet, that's why.'"

It was a foreign class composed of Slavs and one Italian. This unbalanced race distribution resulted in the little Italian boy being at the mercy of the others, and they were certainly aware of it. The teacher was examining this group in the use of words. After a few more or less successful answers she came to the word "disguise," and also to the little Italian's turn. "Now," she said, "I want to know the meaning of disguise. Tony, you give me a sentence with disguise in it." Tony gazed at the grinning faces of his classmates, who not so very long before had been teasing him, and replied with vehemence: "I hate dese guys."

The Piute Indians of California are notoriously lacking in chivalry toward their women. Uncle Arch Farrington was driving down Westgard Pass road one hot summer afternoon and met Fatty Jack, a fat Piute, astride a small pony, which was visibly wobbly under his burden, coming up. Uncle Arch was incensed to note Jack's wife about fifty feet behind the pony carrying a sack of flour and toiling along on foot. As he met the Indian, Uncle Arch called angrily to Jack: "What for you ridem pony, makem squaw walk?" Fatty Jack, not deigning to stop or argue the ethics of the situation, called over his shoulder as he passed on, "She no gottem horse."

Many generations of New Englanders, seafarers and landlubbers, have laughed over the story of the Nantucket skipper who could tell where he was by tasting the sea bottom. There are many versions, but this, says Mr. Morison in his "Maritime History of Massachusetts," is the correct one. Captain Phiney of the staunch sloop Penelope boasted he could tell within half a mile of where he was from Peaked Hill Barr to the tip of Nantucket Shoals by tasting the material brought up by the sounding lead. Obed Fisher, his mate, thought he would call the old man's bluff. One night when the captain was sleeping below he wet and greased the lead, then rolled it in the earth at the bottom of a box which contained Nantucket turnips. Rousing the skipper, he thrust the lead in his face, saying, "For the Lord's sake, cap'n, tell us where we be!" Hastily the skipper tasted, rolling the morsel on his tongue, then jumped from his bunk with a yell, "Nantucket's sunk, Obed, and we're right over Marm Hackett's garden!"

Indian dishes 300 years old and supposed to possess the "magic" properties of breaking in bits if touched with poison have been sold by auction in London recently.

THE MERRY MUZE.

A Ballade of Escape.

(With apologies to Chesterton.)

This talk of Bergson and of Freud,
Of D. H. Lawrence and of Moore,
May be a pleasure unalloyed
To those who like such literature;
For "To the pure all things are pure,"
But to my mind that type of drool
Has little savor, little lure—
Let's go and play a game of pool!

Much Rabelais have I enjoyed,
Droll Stories, too, I find a cure
For fits of blues; I don't avoid Boccaccio; I can endure
Rough bar-room tales that aren't demure;
But from these modern "realists" you'll Excuse me, though I seem a boor—
Let's go and play a game of pool!

Take me away from minds employed
In talk of smelly art that's "newer,"
I will not further be annoyed,
I'll go where "modern minds" are fewer;
Where air with smoke grows ever bluer,
And men's deep laughter is the rule,
And talk is healthier—and truer—
Let's go and play a game of pool!

—Berton Bralys in Judge.

First American Professor of Law.

Few persons, even among lawyers, are aware that the first professor of law in an American college was George Wythe, alumnus and professor of William and Mary, and to whom President Harding in his visit last fall to the college referred as "Wythe, signer of the Declaration and preceptor of Marshall and Jefferson" (says the New York Times). The fact that the new school of government and citizenship will be conducted as a memorial to Wythe and his great pupil, Chief Justice John Marshall, marks a belated recognition on the part of American lawyers of the services to their profession rendered by the eminent Virginian. The chair of law at William and Mary, established in 1779, had only one predecessor in the Anglo-Saxon world, the Vinerian chair at Oxford. Five years before Judge Reeves opened the second American law school at Litchfield, Connecticut, Wythe accepted the William and Mary chair, the college having taken the character and name of a university in 1779, with separate schools of modern languages and municipal law and police.

Wythe's influence as a teacher was far-reaching. He taught Marshall and Jefferson, and advised Henry Clay, who was his amanuensis. Jefferson called him his best friend and "the American Aristides." The Sage of Monticello, advising a youth to go to William and Mary, wrote that "the pride of the institution is Mr. Wythe, one of the chancellors of the state and professor of law in the college. He gives lectures regularly, and holds moot courts and parliaments wherein he presides, and the young men debate regularly in law and legislation, learn the rules of parliamentary proceeding and acquire the habit of public speaking."

The teaching of the principles and history of the Constitution is the object of the Marshall-Wythe School. Its opening marked the first movement by an institution producing large numbers of teachers for the public schools, to equip its graduates to educate their pupils in the obligations and advantages of American citizenship.

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

CYCOL will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Fast Travel Around the World.

Nellie Bly's success in clipping some seven days and seventeen hours from the fabulous record of Phileas Fogg for a voyage around the world is open to no criticism as a performance accomplished with the facilities existing in her time, but it is already possible to point out how the record of John Henry Mears, present holder of the around-the-world championship title, might without too much strain on the imagination be improved upon. Mears made the trip in the summer of 1913 in 35 days, 21 hours, and 35 minutes by the Russian route (says the Portland Oregonian). But only last year a feat of a British officer of the royal air service showed that the Siberian hazard of slow travel can be eliminated and pointed to a practical way in which the time for the entire voyage may be reduced to something like thirty-two days.

Starting from Bagdad at 6 a. m. on September 15th last, the British officer, proceeding home from Mesopotamia in the ordinary course of duty, traveled from Bagdad to London in six days and fourteen hours, arriving there at 8 p. m. on September 21st. He was two days on the way from Mesopotamia to Egypt over an air route which had been opened by the royal air force for the carriage of official mail. He made the rest of the journey to England by sea and rail. It is the belief of aviation experts that the journey eastward from Bagdad to Yokohama can be made in a week, which would make London and Yokohama only thirteen days apart. Mears' record for the remainder of the trip around the world was nineteen days. He was nine days on the voyage from Yokohama to Victoria, B. C., and it took him a few hours over four days to travel from Victoria to New York. On the first lap of his journey he had gone from New York to London in six days. By simply duplicating his performance between Yokohama and London, and by taking advantage of the new route across southern Asia under new conditions, Mears himself would not have a great deal of trouble in reducing his own record time by three days.

Use of the airplane introduces the traveler to a world of which Nellie Bly did not even dream, but it is now remembered that Mears possessed this advantage, although only for a brief stage. This was when he arrived in Victoria and found that an important train connection at Seattle necessitated exceptional measures unless he was to lose practically an entire day on the journey. He then made a short flight across Puget Sound, the train was held for him a bare fifteen minutes, and he was again on his way. By linking up with the established air mail service between Wyoming and New York he might now cut a probable two days more from the journey. It would be wholly feasible therefore to go around the world in a month, or perhaps a trifle less.

Mears' emulators still have a record to go against, however, in the matter of cost. Mears' total expenses were less than $800, including "liberal" tips. This is at least in part accounted for by the circumstance that he passed only a single night in a hotel.

A new daily paper founded by Georges Clemenceau has appeared in Paris. The Echo National, which has long been expected and discussed, is also supported by André Tardieu, who figures as political editor. The paper will probably be run on similar lines to Clemenceau's former organ, L'homme Libre, which subsequently became L'homme Enchaîné during the censorship of the war.

CURRENT VERSE.

Violin Song.

The thing that I am seeking
I know I shall not find:
A wistful voice is crying
This sorrow in my mind.
I know I shall not find it
However far I go.
But I shall always seek it—
My heart has told me so.

Though I must always wander
I do not find it sweet:
There is no journey's ending
To draw my restless feet.
There is no distant vision
To help me on my way;
I know my quest is hopeless
And yet I may not stay.

The thing that I am seeking
Should not be far to seek.
I hear this haunting echo
Through every word I speak.
So I shall always seek it
Down all the roads I go,
But I shall never find it—
My heart has told me so.

—Aline Kilmer.

"Aeterna California."

Superba California, serene and sovereign State,

From snow-clad crests, o'er fertile fields,

Unto thy Golden Gate.

Delecta California; to thee our hymn we raise,

Thy stalwart sons and daughters fair,

Shall ever sing thy praise.

Excelsa California; from Humboldt's forest lands

O'er wild Sierran silvery streams

To Coronado's sands:

Regina California; the ranges crowned with light,

The far-flung hills, the wave-beat shore,

The rolling waters bright.

Eterna California; thy redwoods never die,

Thy sons of men must pass away

When breaks the appointed day;

But we thy children pass and sing,

Rejoicing as we go,

From the dear dust shall beauty spring,

And wild flowers ever grow.

Materna California; we pledge thee, Mother dear,

To bring no shame to thy fair name

By guilt or grief or fear;

But gladly live and freely give

In service small or great,

For common good, one brotherhood,

Thy children consecrate.

—Alex. McAdie.

The Old Roman Road.

England is a peaceful land, a land of long ago;

The stars that look on England watch her children come and go—

Saxon, Norman, Briton, the stars for them have glowed—

A thousand years from us they shone upon the Roman Road.

The English sun is high above the daisy dales and dells,

And Summer's on the land like the music of far bells,—

Poppies red among the wheat, and ripe grass

mowed,

Where the sound of ancient battles died along the Roman Road.

When Hadrian made a barrier at the ending of the world,

And the great name of Rome at the savage Picts was hurled,

The high gods of Latium found a new abode,

And Jupiter the Thunderer ruled the Roman Road.

The old Roman Road, the old Roman Road.

A way of wonder to the lad who would not stay at home,

Who wearied of his villa in the soft Italian land,

And kissed his lady mother and faced northward out of Rome.

Ah! life was young in Britain, and wander-gold was there,

And glory to be gained with a love-rose in her hair—

But for young Patrician Pontius adventure was the goal,

When he won to white Londinium and took the Roman Road.

Up past Eboracum marched legions out of Gaul,

Through the heart of Britain, to guard the northern wall—

Every town was brisk with trade as swinging by

they strode

Marching, marching, marching on the old Roman

Road.

Governors in purple, dancing girls in red,

Wanderers from all the world along this road were led—

Thirsty troopers tramping with spear and shield for food,

And campfires at night all along the Roman Road.

By the old Roman Road where the legions marched along,

The ploughboy finds a rusty coin and sells it for a song,

And where the flashing chariot creaked beneath its load

The gipsy tinker's cart jogs by along the Roman

Road.

—Hoyt Cooper.

General Dawes's Broom.

General Charles G. Dawes, the Administration's apostle of thrift to the benighted department and bureau spenders, exhibited a new broom at the second of his famous mourners' bench conferences (according to the New York Tribune). Why, he asked, does the Navy Department want to purchase 18,000 brooms of this sort when there are 350,000 surplus brooms over in the War Department?

This question, in a hundred forms, has puzzled those who have been wondering what is the matter with the government's business methods. The Washington bureaucracy is not a unit, or even a loose conglomeration of units. It has consisted, rather, of isolated preserves, within which chiefs and their staffs have struggled for autonomy and operative self-control and have fought against coordination and cooperation. General Dawes, with his missionary energy and picturesqueness, is trying to change all this. He is a ruthless reformer and iconoclast. He wants to destroy all the old idols of bureau particularism and self-determination.

He will do it if he sticks much longer to his evangelistic job. President Harding is unconditionally behind him. The writhings of the old guard of self-determinists draw only a smile from the President. He is willing to have his own little joke at their expense, as when he told them on Friday that they were helping to make public saving fashionable. The new budget system is not a fad nor a fancy. It is the symbol of profound change in the attitude of those who administer the government to their responsibilities as public agents and trustees.

Last December the Budget Bureau estimated a deficit of $24,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30th next. That deficit now promises to be converted into a surplus. Economy grows on those who practice it. The habit is striking in at Washington. The broom incident shows that it hasn't struck in all along the line. But General Dawes is there with his timely hints and exhortations. He will not fail. Like another Admiral Tromp, he has hoisted the Navy Department's broom to the masthead.

John Cowper Powys.

Under the general designation of "Living Issues of the Day," John Cowper Powys, the eminent English author, will give the first of a series of Sunday evening lectures beginning February 19th, at the Maitland Theatre, presenting as his first subject, "Misunderstandings Between England and America." Subjects now of vital interest will be covered by Powys during this course, and will include "Mirrors of Downing Street" and "Glass of Fashion," by the Man with the Duster, also "The Problem of Crime," "Society and Divorce," and "Where the World Is Tending."

Powys, who is under the exclusive management of Jessica Colbert, is giving a series of morning talks every Tuesday and Friday at 11 o'clock at the Maitland Theatre on "Books That Live and Die." On Friday he will discuss "The Black Diamond," by Francis Brett Young, and "Sanine," by Artzibasheff. On Tuesday next he lectures on "Brass: A Novel of Marriage," by Charles G. Norris; "Jules the Obscure," by Hardy, and "Women in Love," by Waddington of Wyck.

Japanese Pictures at the Palace of Fine Arts.

A private view and reception will be given by the San Francisco Museum of Art in co-operation with the Japan Society of America in connection with the opening of the exhibition of modern Japanese paintings in the Palace of Fine Arts next Friday afternoon, February 24th. This collection will give the people of San Francisco an opportunity of making a comparative study of the ancient traditional technique of Japanese art as expressed in the work of several masters of screen painting of the seventeenth century with the present-day practitioners of Japanese painting as illustrated in the collection by members of the Nippon Bijutsu-in of Tokyo. The refinement of feeling and technical accomplishment that characterize these modern products of Japan's ancient tradition are the authentic expressions of one of the most highly sophisticated civilizations produced in the world, and should form a most valuable index to the Oriental mind. The exhibition will open to the public Saturday, February 25th, and will continue for a period of one month thereafter. The Museum in the Palace of Fine Arts is open free to the public from 10 to 5 o'clock every day, including Sundays.

The Sistine Choir Coming to San Francisco.

Plans have been started to bring the Pope's Sistine Choir of the Vatican in Rome to San Francisco and the Pacific Coast next August, following a fourteen weeks' tour of the Antipodes, according to Frank W. Healy of this city. Mr. Healy has been commissioned by the Vatican representatives to secure the subscriptions of prominent San Franciscans and the leading music lovers of this city to an underwriting fund of $45,000, which will cover twelve concerts on the Pacific Coast. Archbishop Edward J. Hanna, in addition to voicing his hearty approval of the suggestion, has headed the list of guarantors, and it is thought that the remaining signatures will be secured during the coming week.

This will mark the first American visit of the Pope's Sistine Choir, and great interest is being manifested throughout North and South America in the proposed tour of the two Americas. The choir is to leave Naples, Italy, on March 12th for Australia, opening in Melbourne on Easter Sunday, April 16th. Their Australian tour will include the principal cities of the Antipodes, after which it is proposed to have the entire choir of fifty-four voices come to the Pacific Coast, thence through the important cities of North, Central and South America.

"What do you regard as the most satisfactory form of taxation?" "The kitty in a poker game," replied Senator Sorghum. "It's liberal and perfectly reliable, and at the same

Sea Lingo Antiquated.

A movement is being launched at Seattle, Washington, to berth, especially on the Puget Sound and in the Alaska service, much of the so-called sea talk, or unrecognized nautical vocabulary, that has been in vogue for centuries, and so little understood by the majority of passengers (says the Philadelphia North American).

First assailed is the ship's watch, or bells. The average passenger hears the bell and looks at his watch to verify the time. In case of fire drill the orders are to luff and jibe, yaw and tack, while the bewildered land-lubber stands in the fore-castle amid the combings of the catspaw, wondering which is port-side, stern or athwart. He simply can not fathom when a cable is taut or a line is clew.

There has been much confusion, however, in times of stress and trouble when a captain must order the passengers around the deck, and the misunderstandings have been laid at the feet of these undefined terms.

It is reported that during the sinking of a

Pacific Coast passenger steamer last year several lives might have been saved if passengers could have known what "fill the larboard life-boats" really meant.

Toledo, Ohio, boasts of the largest goldfish hatchery in the world. Last year the firm controlling the hatchery shipped twenty-five carloads of goldfish and twenty carloads of fish globes.

Most every one has seen motor-cars and motorcycles driven by means of air propellers. Now there has been developed in cold Eastern sections an ice-plane so driven. It is easy for this conveyance to reach a speed of fifty miles an hour.

The Treaty in the Senate.

Mr. Wilson does himself honor in a declaration favoring confirmation of the Conference treaties. His attitude is a rebuke to those who imagined that in the spirit of resentment he would employ his unquestioned influence with Democratic senators to embarrass the Administration and further confuse our foreign relations. It now seems improbable that anybody whose vote was given for the league of nations should withhold it from the treaties. Of course, there will be objection on the part of certain irreconcilables. Mr. Reed will howl, Mr. Borah will shout, Mr. La Follette will yowl, and others of the dismal brotherhood of eccentrics will have their say. But the treaties will be confirmed.

Californians will be interested in the action of Senator Johnson. He gave indications a month ago of positive opposition to the treaties. This was at a time when his course in the Senate and out of it harmonized with the views of his friend and patron, William Randolph Hearst. That association now appears to be broken. Furthermore it should be evident to Mr. Johnson that sentiment in his home state is for ratification. He shows signs of hedging and general expectation is that in the final showdown he will vote for confirmation. This would be "good politics," and nobody knows his book of politics better—or can more readily adjust his courses to its suggestions—than Mr. Johnson.

The Four-Power Treaty will come before the Senate accompanied by a recommendation by its Foreign Relations Committee that there be added to it a limiting reservation. It will be to this effect, "That before any agreements or adjustments arrived at in the Conference are binding, they should have the assent of Congress." This addition is obviously unnecessary, since it adds nothing by way of a limitation, nothing to the clarity of the document as originally drawn. It is yielded merely as a sop to the chronic objectors of the Senate.

Here Is a Man!

Mr. Mark L. Gerstle has sent the following letter to San Francisco Post No. 1 of the American Legion:

SAN FRANCISCO, February 14, 1922.

American Legion, San Francisco Post No. 1,

1033 Market Street, San Francisco, Cal.—

DEAR SIRS: Herewith I tender my resignation as a member of the American Legion, San Francisco Post No. 1, and request that the same be accepted at the earliest possible opportunity.

In resigning from the American Legion I feel that it is proper to state that I am prompted to take such action because I am strongly opposed to the position taken by the Legion with reference to the pending Soldiers' Bonus Bill, which I consider most pernicious and indefensible from every viewpoint.

I am heartily in favor of assisting to the maximum extent our veterans who were wounded and incapacitated, or who for any cause require assistance or help, but a universal payment to all soldiers strikes me as a very poor policy, and a measure which the American Legion should condemn with all the force and energy which it can muster. As a citizen who has the best interests of his country at heart I am opposed to class legislation, and can not consistently or honorably remain with an organization which uses its powers with so little regard for what is proper and just. The position taken by the Legion is not in accord with that portion of the preamble of the national constitution adopted by the Legion, which states among other purposes that it is formed "to combat the autocracy of both the classes and masses," for in my opinion the Soldiers' Bonus Bill is an autocratic attempt on the part of the Legion to use its political power, not for the best interests of the country as a whole, but for its own enrichment and benefit.

All soldiers of the recent war can be divided into two classes, namely, those who were drafted and those who volunteered. As to those who were drafted, they performed nothing more than a citizen's duty, and are not entitled to extra compensation, and should not receive it; and as to the volunteers, I venture to say that most of them would consider the offer of extra pay as an insult to their patriotism.

Yours truly, MARK L. GERSTLE.

To Californians it is not necessary to identify Mark Gerstle. But it will interest others to know that he is a citizen of San Francisco of the highest character, that he is connected with many commercial, industrial and financial institutions here, and that he is representative of a family historically associated with the up-building and the sustained life of San Francisco and California. When we entered the war Mr. Gerstle put to one side his personal interests and without reserve gave himself to the great cause. Perhaps no one of the many thousands of Californians who entered military service made more notable sacrifice of personal and domestic interests than did Mr. Gerstle.

Following the war Mr. Gerstle was of those who believed that the membership of our released army afforded a basis for an association under patriotic inspirations. He became a member of the American Legion in confident hope that it would sustain the pledges of its foundation and become a vital force in support of the principles upon which our republic was founded. A man of action, Mr. Gerstle gave freely of his time and his energies in the work of organizing the Legion and of carrying on its constructive programme.

In the letter printed above we have the sequel of Mr. Gerstle's hopes and of his labors. He finds an association organized under patriotic pretensions and pledged "to combat the autocracy of both the classes and the masses" busy in a sordid scheme "for its own enrichment and benefit." Finding that his membership in the Legion involves him in commitments in contempt of the pledge upon which the organization was founded, regarding the offer of the bonus as an insult to patriotism, Mr. Gerstle abandons an affiliation that has stultified its professed principles.

President Harding Assails the Direct Primary.

At a Lincoln Day dinner last week Mr. Harding surprised a Washington audience by an outburst, obviously unpremeditated, in condemnation of the direct primary. He declared himself unequivocally for abolition of the direct primary and for return to the convention system of party nomination. The inspiration of Mr. Harding's views is in plain sight. It rests upon the fact that the direct primary has destroyed party responsibility for candidates and has put a premium on parochial as opposed to national considerations in the matter of so-called national legislation. It has made possible the rise of blocs and balances of power in the national legislature, a system under which party names are first prostituted and then rendered meaningless.

The direct primary harmonizes with the concept of pure democracy. It discords with the system of representative government upon which this republic is founded. The experiment in the direction of pure democracy has failed. It has failed because the American people in a mental sense are equipped only for the representative system. As a people we prefer to let the specialists in any field of endeavor control—even in the field of politics. The rise of the boss system and the glory of the professional politician are facts in point.

It is true enough that we did not get ideal results under the convention system. It is also true that we are getting worse results under the direct primary. The movement that brought about the reform of 1905-06 was based upon the fact that under the convention system not more than 40 per cent. of the qualified voters attended the primaries. Thus it was easy for the so-called bosses to get and keep things in their own hands. The theory was that under the direct primary system the voters would rush to the polls and so nullify conditions that had made for boss rule. The argument was that with greater opportunity and greater responsibility the voters would go eagerly to the primaries to record their convictions. For the first year or two there was some approach to popular response to the new system, but now, as the returns of recent elections show, we are back to the same old 40 per cent. But with this difference, we have lost the ability to fix responsibility for vicious nominations. No longer can we hold a party organization responsible for "yellow-dog" candidates when we directly choose the "yellow dog" because he happens to be skilled in the modern art of publicity or because nobody of sound qualification will make the kind of campaign the direct primary system imposes.

Once upon a time a seat in the Senate or House of Representatives was occasionally purchased, for the most part by indirection. We must give the direct primary system credit for having abolished that evil. But in place of it we have a new vice, that of selling candidacies. Since abolition of the convention system contests for public office have become contests in the art of salesmanship. A candidate, if he would be known, must be exploited by the same methods that a new brand of cigarettes or a particular make of vacuum cleaner is popularized. Even though he may make a spiling campaign of many weeks the candidate himself can reach but few voters. He must be advertised, and in ways that cost a vast amount of money. We have seen all this in our own state; and it has been recently exhibited before the whole country in the Newberry case. There is, to be sure, one factor in our social organization that profits by it—the newspaper press. This perhaps is why there is so little journalistic criticism of the direct primary. Further it explains why President Harding's outburst of last week has been for the most part passed over in silence by the ness of the country. The newspaper publishers—(nowadays there are practically no editors)—are not doing anything to hurt the advertising business.

Recent developments, which very obviously have stirred the resentment of President Harding, exhibit concrete effects of the direct primary. There is the agricultural bloc in the Senate, which insists upon special legislation in the interest of the farming class. There is now rising a pacifist bloc, made up primarily of Middle Western and Southern members, intent, in the sacred name of economy, upon reducing the army and navy below the clearly indicated point of safety. There is the labor group and half a dozen other less developed associations intent upon class legislation of one kind or another. These evils find means of their promotion largely in the direct primary, whose first effect is to establish local and special interests, if not in larger at least in direct view both of voters and of candidates.

The Bonus.

In a communication to the Senate within the week President Harding exhibits himself as "powerfully weak" in the matter of the bonus. He sees no way of raising the necessary millions excepting by a sales tax, which he probably knows a timid Congress will not enact. Fairest of all methods of increasing government revenues at this time, there lies against the sales tax the political objection that it would make taxpayers out of the multitude which now largely escapes taxes. It would especially be resented by the professional labor element, whose patriotism is not of the sort that leads cheerfully to the office of the tax gatherer. Congress is not likely to impose a tax whose political effect would be damaging to those voting for it. The President's alternative is postponement of the bonus project. Obviously he would like to throw it over altogether if he knew how to do it.

It is doubted that Congress will consent to postponement. It stands practically committed to the bonus, and Chairman Fordney has declared that in one form or another the bonus is sure to go through the House of Representatives at this session. Possibly the bill may carry without accompanying provision for raising the necessary money, leaving the vital problem to the President and the Secretary of the Treasury. This would be a cowardly procedure, but that is hardly a reason why the present House of Representatives should not go through with it.

Undoubtedly the President, and probably a majority of both the Senate and the House, would be happier if the whole project might be thrown over. The mischief of the thing is that a wrong start was made. Instead of meeting the demand of the Legion politicians with straight-from-the-shoulder denial, there was a course of evasion and postponement which amounted to practical acceptance of the bonus project as a national obligation. Political calculation did the rest. And we have in consequence a problem pregnant with menace in half a dozen forms.

The President's suggestion of postponement may in one way or another work out. It would for the moment relieve an embarrassing situation. But we should still have the bonus as a vitiating factor in the political situation.

Editorial Notes.

Only a few days back came the interesting news that the Corporation of New York City, of which the official head is Mayor Hylan and the unofficial inspiration none less than William Randolph Hearst, had paid to Senator Hiram Johnson the neat sum of $25,000 as a fee for arguing a case in which the municipality was a party. Right on the heels of this transaction comes further interesting news that Hearst and Johnson have parted company, the breach being the break-up of an entente that has been illustrated in divers and sundry conspicuous ways during the past two or three years, including Senator Johnson's attorneyship for Mr. Hearst in a matter of the Associated Press and the support of Mr. Johnson by Mr. Hearst for the presidential nomination something over a year ago. The smash seems to have come all of a sudden. It is only a little while back that our modern Damon and Pythias seemed on the best of terms—thick as thieves, so to speak. And it is scarcely more than a month when Mr. Johnson was echoing Mr. Hearst's loudly-voiced views respecting the Washington Conference. As to how the breach came about, we have no authoritative information. Perhaps Mr. Johnson declined to follow Mr. Hearst in the effort to form a new political party immediately designed to support his candidacy for the governorship of New York. Or perhaps Mr. Johnson has discovered that California can not be led into opposition to the Conference treaties. Mr. Johnson is a candidate before the people of California for reelection; and to hold the favor of California he must support the treaties and incidentally sustain the general policies of President Harding. To go at the same time with Harding and with Hearst is like riding two horses galloping in opposite directions. Mr. Johnson no doubt conceives it to be his better or at least his more immediate interest to stand with California and in support of the President.

The Federal judiciary suffers no serious loss in the resignation of Judge Landis. A man not without showy parts, Landis is quite as well known for his eccentricities as for the soundness of his knowledge or his character. On the whole he is rather better qualified by nature and propensity as a sporting magnate than for the more serious duties of the United States judgeship. It is not certain that Landis will permanently maintain his position with the baseball folk. As the supreme judge of the baseball world he has exhibited the same sort of eccentricity that has tended rather more or less to discredit him as a Federal judge. The case of "Babe" Ruth is in point. Following his last year's triumphs as a star batter Ruth went on a barnstorming tour, exhibiting his prowess as a dead-sure swatter, and for this violation of what Judge Landis styles the "ethics of baseball" he was suspended from active participation in regular play for the period of several months. If there be rhyme or reason in this rule, it fails to impress the lay mind. What possible harm to anybody could come from public exhibition by Ruth of his skill in batting a ball. Common sense fails to discover a rational answer to this query.

The situation in Ireland appears to have quieted down a bit. But the unhappy island is still far from a state of ideal peace. As at all times this past century or more the Irish may still fairly be described as "fighting like devils for conciliation and hating each other for the love of God." The problems of the Irish Free State are truly grave. To whichever side of the pending situation we turn, the professional agitator is seen in the saddle. De Valera remains at the head of the faction in South Ireland which refuses the Dominion programme. Michael Collins, another furious agitator, is the foremost figure in support of the Dominion settlement and in opposition to De Valera. In both cases the motives of selection are the same. De Valera and Collins are leaders, not because of statesmanlike qualities, including capacity for administration, but for hatred of England and rabble-rousing fervor. Neither, by any stretch of the imagination, can be fairly conceived as proper head of a safe and sane system of government. Before Ireland can be truly pacified she will have to find leaders of more orderly spirit.

For the second time there is a good deal of talk in the newspapers about the intention of Secretary of the Interior Fall to retire from the Cabinet and seek reelection to the Senate. The New York World is sponsor for the newest gossip, which proceeds upon the theory that Fall is resentful of Harding's cautious and compromising methods. It is true enough that Harding is a compromiser and that Fall is a positivist. It is probably true that Fall is impatient over the fact that he can not get Harding to move as fast as he would like. It is possibly true, despite his formal denial, that Fall may be looking for a way out of the Cabinet and for a way to reënter the Senate. And there are reasons why a man like Fall, with legislative experience, should prefer the atmosphere of the Senate to a place in the Cabinet. A Cabinet member is a cog in a machine. A senator is an independent entity, functioning in an atmosphere not so wearying as the routine of a Cabinet post. A senator may talk loud to a Cabinet officer and get away with it; no Cabinet officer ever talks loud to a senator. The exigencies of Republican politics call for a strong and popular Republican candidate for the Senate in New Mexico as against Senator A. A. Jones, Democrat, formerly Assistant Secretary of the Interior. Fall may be the man.

There is an interesting situation in Indiana, where ex-Senator Beveridge is making a run against New (incumbent) for the senatorial nomination. Beveridge has drawn to his support all the old Progressives, plus the disgruntled regulars who have not had just the recognition they think they should have had from the Administration and from Senator New. Among Beveridge's supporters is Mayor Shanks of Indianapolis, an outspoken enemy of prohibition. In his enthusiasm Shanks has talked more than seems good for his candidate. He has contrived unwittingly to mix up Beveridge's candidacy with a movement for repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment. As a consequence the impression is abroad in Indiana that Beveridge is a "wet" and all the "drys" are up in arms against him. Until this mishap occurred to the Beveridge candidacy it was going strong. At Washington the general belief is that New will win the nomination.

President Harding, as the result of careful study of the subject and after consultation with the highest authorities, has indicated that a navy of 80,000 men is the irreducible minimum below which it is unsafe to go. The lowest authoritative army estimate within the limit of safety is the strength of 150,000 men. The pacifist group in Congress, ignoring all counsels and all warnings, is demanding that neither army nor navy shall exceed a total of 50,000 men. In other words, the pacifist group represents itself to the voters of the country as more sincerely devoted to the cause of disarmament than the President. It fails to regard the results of the Washington Conference in their true light, namely, a long step forward in the direction of disarmament rather than the full attainment of disarmament. Again and again the President and his advisers have pointed out that we submitted our minimum to the Conference, which accepted it, and that in the present condition of the world our national safety will not justify further reductions. The era of assured peace has not come nor is it likely to come for a long time, if ever. But now, as after every war, the voice of the demagogue is loud in the land, insisting there is no longer occasion for maintaining any sort of armament, clamoring for special and prodigal financial grants to the ex-service men because they form so large a part of the voting population, destroying those elements of preparedness that are so necessary and so economically an assurance against wastage in the next possible war.

There is curious discrepancy between privileges permitted to one sort of man under one name and another sort of man under another name. Some years back Admiral Peary, after his triumph in finding the North Pole—or the place where the North Pole ought to be—traveled all over the country exhibiting himself and delivering lectures with the consent and approval of the Navy Department. But when, concurrently, several "Jackies" who had accompanied Peary similarly exhibited themselves in the vaudeville theatres they were sharply called down, penalized in one form or another, and reminded that it was not the proper business of navy men to turn show men. The Argonaut fails to see any difference, save in degree and names, of the two enterprises. Peary being allowed to appear on the lecture platform, there would seem no reason why his companions of humbler rank should not have similar privilege to make merchandise of their notoriety and line their pockets. The old saw that what is sauce for the goose ought to be sauce for the gander would seem to apply in this case.

The financial obligations to the United States of Great Britain, France, Italy, and Belgium on war account stand to date as follows:

|                     | Principal.         | Accumulated int.   |
|---------------------|--------------------|--------------------|
| Great Britain ..... | $4,166,318,358.44 | $ 530,005,334.68  |
| France .....        | 3,358,104,083.20   | 374,708,357.51     |
| Italy .....         | 1,648,044,050.90   | 210,519,902.32     |
| Belgium .....       | 377,564,298.77     | 44,587,520.27      |
| Total .....         | $9,550,020,791.31 | $1,159,821,214.78 |

The aggregate of principal and accumulated interest is the prodigious sum of $10,709,842,006.09. Another very considerable sum was loaned to Russia in the early period of the war, but it is not now regarded as an asset. President Harding has named Secretaries Mellon, Hoover, and Hughes, Senator Smoot and Representative Burton as a commission to consider ways and means of dealing with this phase of our national finances. The commission will consider the situation in all its aspects, and its report will be the basis of administrative policy. There are various opinions as to what may be expected in the way of payment. The amount due from Great Britain is generally appraised at par value, though it is obvious that it will take time, and a good deal of it. That France can pay now or at any future time is doubtful; and the same with Italy. Belgium is not in a position to pay, and if ever she shall be the date must be far ahead. We believe this debt should be canceled. Surely if the matter were to come before the American people as a concrete proposition they would by overwhelming vote declare for cancellation. However, speculation is idle until we shall have from the commission definite information as to the financial conditions of the several countries to which we have extended credit. In general it may be said with reference to these debts that they may hardly be considered as ordinary obligations. They may properly be classified as advances made to our allies under stress and as expenditures upon war account. Mr. Burton has put the matter concisely in the remark that "this is no time to insist upon what is termed honest usance. It is a time for generosity."

It is neither logical nor fair to attribute the marriage of a potential American heiress, age sixteen, to an European riding master of forty-eight—"or more"—to the willingness of American girls to "marry anybody." Where consent is yielded by parents of the bride to an alliance so incongruous there are presumably considerations more imperative than willingness of the lady in the case to "marry anybody." It is probably a case where anybody is better than nobody.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

Two Serious Problems.

SAN FRANCISCO, February 22, 1922.
TO THE EDITOR—Sir: The people of California are confronting two tremendous problems at the present time. First, the conservation of our wonderful highway system, and second, the preservation of the steam and electric railways.

First—The legitimate function of a highway is the accommodation of private owners of vehicles for their individual pleasure and business. They are not designed nor intended as permanent roadbeds for transportation business and can never be depended upon to fulfill that function.

Only a comparatively few years ago we began the construction of a system of highways designed to be mechanically the best and most complete in the country, but the advent of the motor bus and truck has demonstrated that with all the increased cost of each succeeding section of roadway built we have not yet developed a roadbed which will stand the everlasting pounding of this traffic for which highways were never intended.

Roads that were designed and built honestly for 95 per cent. of the traffic have been hammered to pieces by 5 per cent. of the traffic, which latter refers to the buses and trucks, and to what end? The early destruction of many of our highways, calling for rebuilding on a far more expensive scale and calling for all new highways to be designed for the heaviest traffic, which is only 5 per cent., if that 5 per cent. is to be allowed to continue, and all this an added burden for the taxpayers.

Are we to continue this expensive construction and maintenance to provide a practically free right-of-way roadbed and maintain the same for a traffic which pays nothing for its use except a simple license, the same as any ordinary pleasure vehicle? It is generally conceded that a highway capable of standing the legitimate 95 per cent. of travel can be built for $30,000 per mile. If this abnormal traffic is to be perpetuated we must pay at least $50,000 per mile, an extra $20,000 per mile for 5 per cent. of the travel. Are we taxpayers going to stand for this—to make and maintain such roads for a traffic never contemplated, which can not take the place of railroads and only serves to bankrupt them?

Second—Electric and steam railroads are absolutely the only safe, sane, and permanent means of commercial traffic, and no country can prosper without them. Their rights-of-way must be bought, tunnels and cuts made, bridges and culverts built, tracks laid, engines and cars bought, all kinds of buildings erected at enormous cost to operate this essential means of transportation must be paid for, and interest and profit earned, while the same railroads must pay their share of cost and maintenance of the highways which are giving practically free rights to their competitors. Can we do without railroads? If not, we should see that they have the right to a fair return on their investment.

It is estimated that the gross receipts of bus and truck lines in 1921 exceeded $20,000,000. Had this revenue gone where it legitimately belongs, from $1,000,000 to $1,500,000 would have gone to the state in taxes. Most interesting is the fact that one of these transportation companies actually sold their franchise over our free highways for $6000.

The total investment in electrical railroads during 1920 is stated to be $327,425,635, employing 17,544 persons.

One electric road employing 5054 people in October, 1921, has been subjected to competition of 242 buses employing probably not exceeding 300 persons, with a direct loss of $4042.35 per day during the same month. This company has had to borrow $13,000,000 in the last six years to meet deficits and have done this to save their investment in the hope that a sane policy would eventually be restored.

With the steam roads the situation is equally bad. There are over 20,000 less men employed than should be, representing over $20,000,000 in wages, and everything in the way of extensions has been at a standstill for five years. Several small roads have been abandoned, notably the Ocean Shore, which has left the communities formerly served by it in a deplorable condition for transportation. Otherwise, all service has been curtailed until the traveling public is almost desperate. Can we take the chance of having other roads abandoned?

As a heavy shipper and taxpayer the writer, with thousands of others, requires better service and lower rates, but what right have we to ask or expect it when we are permitting a condition which makes the granting of these needs impossible? The situation is approaching a crisis and must be met.

Again, every dealer in railroad material and supplies could give some startling figures in the falling off of demand in these lines of business. The railroads are the largest employers of labor and the largest buyers of material in existence.

One bus line employing seven stages costing not to exceed $12,000 (as most of them are old automobiles built over) has taken fully 95 per cent. of the passenger traffic from the railroad eighty-one miles in length running between the same points, and this railroad has cost several million dollars to build and is costing a large amount in maintenance every day; and at the same time the railroad is paying heavily in taxes to build and maintain the highway for which the successful competition pays nothing but seven automobile license fees. Who pays the piper? We taxpayers. And how long can this railroad serve this section?

From October 1, 1920, to September 20, 1921, one truck transportation company carried between Los Angeles and Riverside 52,630,000 pounds of freight, between Los Angeles and Santa Barbara 925,294 pounds, between Los Angeles and Santa Paula 306,000 pounds. Seventeen truck companies operating in the south have 120 trucks and fifty-two trailers with a monthly capacity of 78,130 tons, all with rights-of-way, splendid highways, bridges, etc., and maintenance for nothing but an automobile license.

Who pays for this? We taxpayers. And our railroad system is in a precarious condition. Can we afford to let this continue? It has been stopped in same Eastern states where transportation companies refused to continue operation. It was stopped in Oakland to save bankrupting the electric railway company. It was not stopped in the Ocean Shore case, and that section will not soon forget the lesson.

Business men want more business, taxpayers want less burden of taxes, shippers want more service and better rates, and individual owners of vehicles want more safety in traveling their legitimate highways.

The citations above can be verified, and hundreds of other instances and details can be furnished if desired. This is a very serious matter and should be remedied immediately. We want the highways for their legitimate purposes and we want our transportation system preserved and developed if we are going to grow as we should.

AMERICA AND JAPAN.

An Address by Mr. Peter F. Dunne at a Dinner Given to the Japanese Envoys.

Among several exceptionally excellent speeches made at a banquet at the Fairmont Hotel on Monday evening last, complimentary to the returning Japanese Commissioners to the Washington Conference (Baron Kato and Mr. Hanahara), was one by Mr. Peter F. Dunne. It is given here because it presents in concise form the spirit and attitude of intelligent Americans—and particularly of intelligent Californians—with respect to Japan, her conditions, her motives, and her policies:

MR. CHAIRMAN, LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: I join with Admiral Shoemaker—it is gratifying, here in California, to greet these distinguished representatives of Japan. The war is over, but we are not to forget that their country ranged itself with the Allies, associated itself with us, in the war for civilization and the rights of humanity. More than that, they came here the exponents and signatories of the great covenant for peace and good-will among the nations. President Harding sensed the situation. He called the Conference, Japan responded promptly, and cooperated cordially. The vague yearnings for peace of a war-weary world were translated into a concrete programme. The mad, competitive building of warships was halted. A definite limitation was put upon armaments. But the warship was a symptom, only, and an indication. Behind and deeper lay the problems of the Far East, and they circled round the vast empire and people of China. The Conference stood for the integrity and independence of China and for the policy of the "Open Door"—the principle of equal and impartial trade for the world with all parts of the Chinese Empire. And to this Japan subscribed freely and unreservedly.

Live and let live—that is the aspiration that has filled the hearts of perplexed men and women, longing for a place in the sun. Nations, too, have longed for a place in the sun, none more than Japan. She has her own problems in the Pacific. They are not the problems of the pirate or the conqueror. They are economic, and touch her self-preservation and national life. Her population is the densest in the world. She has 400 people to the square mile. Our continental United States has 35. With our hundred and ten millions of people today, if we were to expand and measure up to the density of Japan's population, there would be more than a billion of people in continental United States. When you think of what a problem that would be, you begin to realize the problem that Japan is facing today.

Eighty per cent. of the coal of Asia is in China, perhaps one per cent. is in Japan. And so it goes with iron; and with oil, too; and with raw material generally. Agriculture will not suffice. Japan is mountainous; only 15 per cent. of her land is arable. Hence the intensive cultivation of the land in Japan, which has moved the wonder of the tourist. These people must go to manufactures, if they would not perish. But where to get raw material, to be worked up and traded with as finished products? Nature gave Japan the geographical advantage of proximity to the Asiatic mainland of China. To the less densely populated and neighboring parts of that vast region Japan looked for an abiding place to receive her surplus and overflowing population. She looked to the same place and the same neighborhood for the raw materials of her industries. Who can say that by the law of necessity and self-preservation, and by the fact and advantage of neighborhood, Japan has not a natural and legitimate interest in a China of the Open Door.

Seventy years ago Perry called Japan out of her isolation and brought her in contact with the larger world. Our own interests in the Pacific and in the Far East have grown apace since Perry's advent. We are in mid-ocean at the Hawaiian Islands. We are in the South Pacific at Samoa. We are in the Far East at the Philippines. We are marketing our products and commodities in China. Our business men have set up factories in China. They saw the advantage of nearness to abundant supplies of raw materials, of nearness to cheap and very efficient labor, and of relatively cheap freight rates to the export markets. We seek no territorial aggrandizement in China. We do seek to do business there. We ask a fair field and no favor. We want the Open Door. The Conference assures this for us, for Japan, for all the world, and Japan has set her seal upon the Conference.

For seventy years Japan has been appropriating the lessons of Occidental civilization with an alertness and capacity that has astounded the world. She has shown courage and strength in battle. She has advanced by leaps and bounds to be a world power, ranking with any. The days of feudalism and the shogun have passed. She has entered upon an era of constitutional government. No taxation may be imposed on her people which does not originate, as is the case with us, in the popular and elective branch of her legislature. She has an intellectual history behind her, adorned with literature and a wonderful art. Her people are amiable and well-mannered, by consent of the world. Is the thought to be endured that between such a people and our people questions in the Far East, if any, pending or to come, can not be settled as two mutually respecting and honorable gent.

I settle differences—not by violence and bloodshed and destruction, but by the methods of conference and the arguments and amenities of peace?

A word as to the attitude of California: No man or woman worth while but has achieved something of a personal equation. And the nations have their equations. They have their own cultural ideals and traditions, the outcome of long heredity and distinctive environment. Those are the ideals and traditions which make the country, in contrast with mere political jurisdiction, the home-land, and assimilate it to the household; and they are reflected, in association with economic factors, in questions like immigration and ownership of the soil. The point of view, the orientation as well of Japan as of our own country and our state, towards these questions, has much in common, as exhibited in their policies and legislation. For the resolution of such questions an authority is provided, the supreme national authority of both governments, working through the treaty-making power. Whatever propagandists and opportunists may say, questions like these can be adjusted and will be adjusted by the two governments, holding much the same point of view, without friction or resentment or violence. The thoughtful citizenship of California is for peace. It is for friendship, not for irritation and ill-will. When the distinguished guests of the evening take ship tomorrow, to report to their government and people, they will bear with them from our people a message of peace and good-will to Japan.

Open Letter to Senator McCormick Published in "Le Matin," Paris, January 18, 1922.

MY DEAR SENATOR: You have just caused the Senate of the United States to pass a strange resolution. It invites the Secretary of State, Mr. Hughes, to make a broad inquest upon the revenues, expenses, and deficits of the European states. It especially requests him to exactly ascertain the amount of money that each of these states devotes to its land forces. The naval armaments do not interest you; you consider them quite legitimate, don't you, my dear senator? And what concerns you is, not the millions spent in building capital ships, but those spent maintaining soldiers.

I do not know what answer you will get from the Secretary of State, Mr. Hughes, concerning the Russian army, which, according to a declaration of his excellency Mr. Trotzky, exceeded on January 1st one million and a half men; but I can, right now, make known to you the answer that he will surely give you concerning the army of the French Republic.

You have lived a long time in our midst and can not ignore, my dear senator, that we have a public budget of expense, of which thousands of copies are printed every year. Had you expressed the wish of having one of those copies we would have hastened to forward it to you.

You would have seen therein that the ordinary expenses of the French War Office for 1922 amount exactly to 2,959,195,269 francs, divided into four items:

|                                     | Francs.       |
|-------------------------------------|---------------|
| Metropolitan troops .....           | 2,150,773,752 |
| Colonial troops .....               | 225,000,636   |
| Construction and new material ..... | 144,927,200   |
| Morocco .....                       | 438,493,681   |
| Total .....                         | 2,959,195,269 |

I think that out of this total we may in all justice deduct the 438 millions of Morocco and the 225 millions for colonial troops.

Out of the item, "metropolitan troops," we may also deduct 157,890,000 francs, cost of our gendarmerie (armed police) for France and Tunis, for even when one has no army one must have a gendarmerie. After having made these deductions, it appears that the French army will cost France in 1922 exactly the sum of 2,139,485,269 francs—or in the neighborhood of one-twelfth the total amount of the budget of the expenses of France, which exceeds 25,000,000,000 francs. Two billion one hundred and thirty-nine million four hundred and eighty-five thousand two hundred and sixty-nine francs is the amount we will devote to our metropolitan army.

I might call to your attention the fact that out of this sum there are not four hundred million for war material, and that most of this money will be spent to house, feed, and clothe the men who, at all events, would have to be clothed, fed, and housed.

But let us take these 2,139,485,269 francs as they are and let us convert them into dollars at the rate of twelve francs per dollar. This sum amounts to $178,290,439.

Now we see that for the fiscal year 1921-1922 the American war budget exceeds $300,000,000, and for the fiscal year 1916-1917 (the year preceding the entrance of the United States into the war) this American war budget amounted to exactly $358,158,361.

France therefore spends today for her land forces one-half of what the United States spends, and one-half of what the United States spent before the war.

Such are, my dear senator, the figures you asked for—and that perhaps you did not expect. But, then, there are also our debts, the amount of which you wanted to ascertain. You will also find them in the French budget.

The war has cost us 280,658,000,000 francs. It has caused our interior debt to reach the enormous sum of 230 billions; it has compelled us, who had not a centime of foreign debt, to borrow thirty-five billions from the outside; it forces us at the present time to inscribe each year into our budget, before anything else, thirteen billions to pay the interest and amortization on what we owe; thirteen billions of debt out of a budget of twenty-five billions.

This is what is crushing us, my dear senator, much more than the two billions of our land forces, and these thirteen billions will annually weigh upon our shoulders for generations and generations; we may bear that weight eternally. And of these thirteen billions annually paid by us for services rendered civilization Germany will never give us back a centime, because the treaty of peace states that she does not owe them to us.

And these thirteen billions will increase soon by other billions that you and our English friends will exact from us for the interest and amortization of the thirty-five billions we owe you.

You thus know everything, my dear senator. I have not mentioned our naval expenses because you are not interested in them, and because naval expenses seem to you a negligible quantity. In fact, ours are totally so. They amount, for 1922, to $67,650,000, out of which scarcely $11,000,000 for new construction and war material. Please avoid putting those figures alongside of yours or those of our British friends; they would appear Lilliputian. Merely remember the three figures that the United States Senate requested from us through you: an annual budget of expenses of twenty-five billion francs.

Out of these twenty-five billions, thirteen billions because war has been waged against us, and two billions (less than what you spend yourselves) in order that war be waged against us no more.

Yours very sincerely,
STEPHANE LAUZANNE.

LENIN.

The reasons suggested by representatives of the Allied governments for postponing the Genoa conference have been interesting and various, but the chief gnat or camel in the diplomatic throat appears to be Lenin. In France it is feared that his recognition would threaten a supersession of the existing league of nations and revision of the treaty of Versailles, a catastrophe which is imagined to be Lloyd George's darling wish. Commercial interests in all the Allied countries are tempted by the opportunity that seems to offer for the restoration of capitalism in Russia, but are deterred by a rather equal fear. They question on the one hand whether Lenin's hold on the reins of government is secure enough to warrant such a move, and on the other whether it is not so strong and his character so untrustworthy that the rehabilitation of Russian industry would defeat its own purpose and set up a tyranny whose effects would be felt beyond Russia. In the midst of this clamor the objections of Russia herself are scarcely audible. Indeed to the outside world almost all Russian voices but Lenin's are stilled. But beyond the circle of his stifling influence one Russian protest becomes articulate. It does not come, as might be supposed, from defenders of the Czaristic régime. These are said to have their reasons for wishing to see a capitalistic restoration under Bolshevik control. It comes from a group who feel that such a restoration would pave the way for a return to absolute monarchy, and that it would be a singularly desperate and cruel irony if a country that had blundered through such gory quagmires in its groping for freedom should be restored at long last to the servitude it started from.

This party, whether ascendant or not, has an honorable and interesting record. It is led by Miakotine and Pechekhonof, former colleagues of Tchaikovsky, the present head of the government at Archangel, and it appears to be the only political group in Russia that has stuck to its original platform. Its main planks have been "national defense, free from all chauvinism and imperialistic policies; fidelity to alliances; the democratic 'bill of rights'; a constituent assembly; a union of all forces recognizing the sovereignty of universal suffrage, and the achievement of the most far-reaching social reforms in a legal manner."

A member of this socialist and counter-revolutionary group, M. A. Landau-Aldanov, has written a study of Lenin—now issued in translation by E. P. Dutton & Co. His indictment of Lenin and the Bolshevik régime is all the more cogent for being written by one in whom no reactionary or "bourgeois" would recognize a colleague, though Lenin applies that damning term to all his opponents. Aldanov pleads for the ballot as the basic means of reform, urging that any other method involves a devotion toward ancient abuses, and that, as water can not rise above its own level, so no government can permanently contradict the instincts of a majority of its citizens. In one of his comments he gives a new color to the term Bolshevism, which may surprise those who regard that system as the logical antithesis of plutocracy. There are Bolsheviks among the capitalists, says Aldanov, and in character they closely resemble Lenin. Aldanov's test of the Bolshevik in every grade of society is a desire to tamper with the principle of representative government and free suffrage. Here is a new source of consternation for the phalanxes of rule by privilege. On this definition Senator Newberry and his friends suddenly confront their own and the world's startled gaze as Bolsheviks.

Such interchanging of political epithets is typical of the present ideological confusion. From Lenin's viewpoint Aldanov is a bourgeois because he conforms to a system of government that has countenanced capitalism. From the angle of the capitalist this same Aldanov is a dangerous red. Lenin, in the interest of the common people, decreed the death of a Czar in order to establish himself as an even more arbitrary tyrant. And so on. While in New York recently Mr. H. G. Wells dropped in to see Max Eastman and the staff of the Liberator. Max, being a genial gentleman with a sense of humor, received his visitor urbanely, and commented on the incident afterwards in the same terms, with an acknowledgment that Mr. Wells and himself differed on some questions of method, but were agreed in the matter of motives. But the fierce and blood-shot Greenwich Villagers who surround Mr. Eastman's thoughtful if mistaken articles in the Liberator with columns of pyrotechnic nonsense quickly pounced on the unfortunate Wells and on the opportunity of telling him how dull they considered him in the Village. On his departure Mike Gold exclaimed, "A bourgeois, boys, a bourgeois, by the sacred whiskers of Karl Marx." Well, the man who occasioned this hectic blurb is looked on by most of the "bourgeoisie" as a radical, being, like Aldanov, an evolutionary socialist. But to return to our wolf.

Lenin's right name is Vladimir Iliitch Oulianov. His father was a "state counselor" and superintendent of the public schools at Simbirsk, which may help explain Aldanov's statement that Lenin is one of the only three men in the Bolshevik ranks with any claim to education. He comes from the hereditary nobility, though his apologists have insisted that his father was of peasant origin. The author pictures him as a "remarkable combination of the violence of the country squire with the elementary shrewdness of the peasant."

His brother, Alexander Oulianov, belonged to the younger revolutionary set of the populist party that plotted the assassination of Alexander III in 1887, and was one of the four who were caught on the Nevsky Prospect with bombs in their pockets on that occasion and hanged in the jail yard of the Schlüsselburg fortress.

Lenin, after completing his course in the Lycée, studied law at the University of Kazan, where he followed his brother's lead by frequenting student groups interested in Populist literature, but soon deserted this faction for the rival "Marxians." Expelled from the university, he went to Petrograd and organized there the first groups of working men and Marxian intellectuals. Twice an exile, he spent several years abroad, was implicated in the revolution of 1905, and in 1912 settled in Cracow to direct the Bolshevik movement in Russia from a kind of proletarian Vatican. The war found him in a small village in Galicia, where he was arrested by the local authorities, but almost immediately freed by the central government in Austria, who realized that it was "more advantageous to its cause to give complete freedom of action to a Russian of that breed." He then went to Switzerland, and the remainder of his career, from his return to Russia in the famous "sealed car" in March, 1917, to the present, is a matter of general knowledge: the unsuccessful revolt of July, 1917; his flight into Finland; his victorious entry into the Smolny Institute at the head of the People's Commissars; the armistice with Germany; the peace of Brest-Litovsk; the communist experiments; the reign of terror; the Third International; the "dictatorship of the proletariat"; chaos, civil war, and the final collapse.

The dictator here pictured by Aldanov is a queer compound of sincerity and guile. Aldanov credits him with scrupulous honesty, and distinguishes him among his faction as "the Bolshevik who remained poor." Though he would steal a pocketbook if necessary for the Bolshevik cause, he has no personal greed for wealth. A love of power seems in him to have swallowed up every other passion, and to the perpetuation of that power the integrity and frugality of his private life is, of course, a large contributory factor. He tolerates, however, every kind of delinquency in his followers, and measures conduct by no other standard than the immediate advantage of Bolshevism. In philosophy he is a complete materialist, a cold, shrewd analyst and tactician among the fiery Utopists that surround him. But he understands all their weaknesses and those of the people who follow them. Accomplished in all the arts of the demagogue, he uses them sparingly, and carries his point when possible by sheer weight of earnestness. He is a man of wide reading, but much of it is ill coordinated and his literary style is among the worst in Russia. Trotsky easily excels him as a rhetorician. But Lenin has a complete contempt for what he calls the "grandiloquent hot air" of the Trotsky school, and an even greater contempt for Trotsky. Aldanov gives an interesting example of the latter's fatuity:

The Russian soldiers who came to Marseilles in 1916 assassinated one of their colonels. It seems a copy of the paper which Trotsky was then publishing in Paris (Nache Slovo) was found in the possession of one of these soldiers, and that was one of the reasons for the expulsion of Trotsky from France. Was Trotsky embarrassed? Not at all. Trotsky made a sensational statement with reference to the matter, "The Russian government organized a little assassination in France through its agents provocateurs in order to give weight to their argument against me." That the government of the Czar should have had one of its colonels assassinated to give an argument in favor of deporting Trotsky to Spain is a discovery which seems to show the sheer folly of the author.

Beside a man of this type it is not difficult for Lenin to shine in the eyes of his disciples with the integrity of a Savonarola. But of the two, partly perhaps on that account, Lenin is infinitely the more deadly.

Aldanov charges this Robespierre of the social revolution with having dishonored the work of the greatest Russian patriots and falsified the principles of the very philosopher on whose principles he pretends to base his despotism. By intimidation, violence, and every ballot-loading device he has extinguished representative government in Russia and elevated to absolute power men even less fit to rule than the Russian imperialists they overthrew. He has made a mockery of freedom of speech and publication, and has wielded to the full the most anti-democratic privilege with which force can invest an iniquitous tyranny—a denial of the right of free discussion. In this respect Aldanov depicts him as the most malignant of reactionaries, reviver of the "roasting bees," "hanging prees," and chambres ardentes of the old kings, and a man who is now capable of inaugurating an even more horrible injustice than that which has lately darkened the face of Russia. Aldanov sees the remedy to Lenin, not in a capitalistic state with Lenin as its head, but in a final revolution that will remove this last despotism and restore the Constituent Assembly, based on universal suffrage—a consummation that the majority of Russians desire. Such is this author's portrait of Lenin in slender outline: its full vindication rests with time.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Captain Lew Wallace, Jr., of Crawfordsville, Indiana, has been appointed director of savings of the United States Treasury Department. Mr. Wallace is the grandson of General Lew Wallace, author of "Ben Hur."

Gerald du Maurier, actor-manager of Wyndham's Theatre, and son of George du Maurier, the beloved author of "Trilby," was created a knight in the New Year's honor list. Du Maurier was born in 1873. He married in 1903 Muriel Beaumont, an actress. They have three handsome daughters.

Mme. Aki-ko Ito—in English "the White Lotus"—the cousin of the Emperor of Japan, and leader in the struggle for the emancipation of Japanese women, is the first of her sex and race to sue for a divorce. It has hitherto been the sole privilege of the Japanese husband to ask a divorce from his wife. Mme. Ito has established a precedent that is the talk of the day of Tokyo society. No other attempt at breaking Japanese tradition has created such a sensation and caused such debate as has Mme. Ito's bold move for a divorce. An endless stream of letters, the writers of which take sides in the remarkable case, appear in the Japanese press. Many of them are written by women who approve Mme. Ito's act, but the majority come from conservative men and women, who maintain that the Japanese social structure will crumble if women are allowed to divorce their husbands. This opinion was given at a meeting of women in Tokuoko, Mme. Ito's home. The Osaka-Ashi pleads for Mme. Ito, emphasizing the mitigating circumstances of her case.

Viscountess Rhondra, Britain's foremost business woman, sometimes called the greatest woman in England, is of the optimistic opinion that business is on the upgrade and that a trade revival is in process. The viscountess is said to be on the directorate of upwards of fifty important industrial corporations, including the Anglo-Argentina Coal Company, Cambrian Collieries, Globe Shipping Company, and the South Wales Printing and Publishing Company. As chairman of the Sanatogen Company she has built up a world trade for a proprietary remedy. In financial circles in "the city" she is said to be a vital factor in British business. Margaret Haig Mackworth, second Viscountess Rhondra, was born in 1883, the daughter of the first Viscount Rhondra. Her own title was created in 1918. Her long fight to establish her right to a seat in the House of Lords has kept her in the limelight. But in Whitehall there is little disposition to deride her claims. It is forecast that the king in opening Parliament one day will have to say, "My Lords and My Lady." The viscountess married in 1908 Sir Humphrey Mackworth.

Interest, which languished almost to the vanishing point in American participation in the Olympic games, has taken on new life since Colonel Robert T. Thompson accepted the executive post and quickened public enthusiasm by changing the rather discredited name from Olympic Association to the American Committee for Olympic Games. Colonel Thompson resided in Washington, D. C., for many winters, and awakened interest in many sports and worthy causes. He was president of the Naval League and had quite a robust controversy with the Democratic Secretary of the Navy, Josephus Daniels, in the Wilson administration, from which he emerged victorious, actually, though officially under the ban. Colonel and Mrs. Thompson are at present in Southern California. Colonel Thompson will go East in the spring to take hold of the Olympic problem and see if he can not make conditions for American participants more comfortable than they have been. Scores of good sportsmen are keenly concerned in his success. Colonel Thompson will look after the rules and regulations himself. He enjoys the reputation of being a fearless fighter, and one who will never relinquish a point when right is on his side.

Not since the crowded days of the war have so many distinguished and titled members of the Italian nobility been domiciled in Washington as at the present. Commandante Fabrizio Ruspoli, who is serving as one of the experts on naval questions with the delegation of which Senator Schanzer is chief, spent several years at the embassy during the régime of Baron Camillo Avezzano. He married Miss Marjery Butt of London and resides near the Baths of Lucca in Lombardy. The Princess Ruspoli has never accompanied her husband to this country, and is at present with her parents in Surrey. A younger brother of Commandante Ruspoli, Prince Napoleone, is a captain of cavalry, and ten years ago, during a visit to this country, he met Miss Katharine Quay of Sewickley, a cousin of the well-known senator from Pennsylvania, Matthew Quay. A romance developed and the marriage occurred in New York City in October, 1912. Prince and Princess Ruspoli also reside near the baths of Lucca, where this branch of the Ruspolis, who are nobles of Florence and Lucca, have their principal seat. The family was founded in 1300 at Parma, which is adjacent to Lucca, and have been princes since the early part of the fifteenth century. There are four or five distinct branches and all have formed alliances with Americans, and several because of this kinship bear the given names of George Washington and of Thomas Jefferson.

"THE MAN WHO LIVED WITH CANNIBALS."

Raymond Weaver Relates the Adventures of Herman Melville in the South Pacific.

Herman Melville was one of those writers who are humbly admired by authors more famous than themselves, but who command no great following among the general public. He might truthfully be called an author of authors—particularly of authors who have dealt with the mysteries of the sea. In this field Masefield credits him with a master's supremacy. Stevenson owed much to him, Barrie admitted having modeled Hook in "Peter Pan" on Captain Ahab in "Moby Dick," London adapted from the same novel many of his most effective scenes and theses, Conrad and Kipling were his debtors, and W. Clark Russell paid him and Dana this acknowledgment: "They gave us a full view of the life led by tens of thousands of men whose very existence, till these wizards arose, had been as vague to the general land intelligence as the shadows of clouds moving under the brightness of the stars. . . . They were the first to lift the hatch and show the world what passes in a ship's fore-castle."

It might be added that Melville was the first writer to lift the mists that enshrouded in his day the lives of the Pacific islanders. The fault found with him by his contemporaries was that he disclosed in the fore-castle a sepulchre of human offscourings infinitely less Christian than the savage camps into which they bore the standards of Christendom, and that in general he thought the heathen Polynesians as capable of teaching us as we them. With such a theme he, of course, ran foul of many religious and lay prejudices, with results not favorable to his reputation.

As the son of a very old and distinguished American family, Melville first outraged the proprieties by running away to sea. His reaction to fore-castle life was what might have been expected, but having tasted the briny chalice of the deep and incurred that most unquenchable of thirsts, he soon signed for another voyage, this time on the Acushnet, one of the whalers that cruised the Pacific in the great days of the Nantucket whale fisheries. This ship brought him into the Marquesas in the heathen heyday of those islands, and Melville, being eager for any respite from the company of his fellow-seamen, decided that the society of cannibals might be preferable:

Strangely jumbled anticipations haunted Melville, he says, as drowsing on the silent deck of the Acushnet he was being borne towards land: towards the Marquesas, one of the least known islands in the Pacific.

"The Marquesas! What strange visions of outlandish things does the very name spirit up!" exclaims Melville in excited prospect. "Naked hours—cannibal banquets—groves of cocoa-nut—coral reefs—tattooed chiefs—and bamboo temples; sunny valleys planted with bread-fruit trees—carved canoes dancing on the flashing blue waters—savage woodlands guarded by horrible idols—heathenish rites and human sacrifices."

After fifteen months aboard the Acushnet, Melville was ripe to discover alluring Edenic beauties in tropical heathendom. And in the end, so intolerable was the prospect of dragging out added relentless days under the guardianship of Captain Pease, that as a last extremity Melville preferred to risk the fate of Captain Cook, and find a strolling cenotaph in the bellies of a tribe of practicing cannibals.

He had studied his shipmates with an intimacy that was later to furnish him material for many interesting pages, but among them he was drawn toward only one, a youth named Richard Tobias Greene, who subsequently appeared in the novel "Typee" as an embodiment of the Trojan virtues. When Melville communicated his plan to "Toby" the latter responded with enthusiasm:

On the morrow, with as much tobacco, ship's biscuit, and calico as they could stow in the front of their frocks, Melville and Toby made off for the interior of Nukueva—but not before Melville "lingered behind in the fore-castle a moment to take a parting glance at its familiar features." Their five days of marvelous adventures that landed them finally in the valley of Typee has abidingly tried the credulity of Melville's readers—though never for an instant their patience. After reading these adventures, Stevenson expressed his slangy approval by hailing Melville as "a howling cheese." It has been questioned in passing whether or not the number of days that two strong male humans, going through incredible exertion, can support themselves upon a hunk of bread soaked in sweat and ingrained with shreds of tobacco, must not be fewer than Melville makes out. And did they, in sober verity, critics have asked, lower themselves down the cliff by swinging from creeper to creeper with horrid gaps between them—was it as steep as Melville says, and the creepers as far apart? And did they, on another occasion, as Melville asserts, break a second gigantic fall by pitching on the topmost branches of a very high palm tree? During these thrilling and terrible five days, hardship runs hard on the heel of hardship, and each obstacle as it presents itself seems, if possible, more unsummountable than the last. There is no way out of this, one says for the tenth time; but the sagacity and fearless confidence of Toby—to whom let glory be given—and the manful endurance of Melville through parching fever and agonizing lameness, disappoint the lugubrious reader. On the third day after their escape, their ardor is cooled to a resolve to forego futile ramblings for a space. They crawled under a clump of thick bushes, and pulling up the long grass that grew around, covered themselves completely with it to endure another down-pour. While the exhausted Tony slept through the violent rain, Melville tossed about in a raging fever, without the heart to wake Toby when the rain ceased. Chancing to push aside a branch, Melville was as transfixed with surprised delight as if he had opened a sudden vista into Paradise. He "looked straight down into the bosom of a valley, which swept away in long wavy undulations to the blue waters in the distance. Midway towards the sea, and peering here and there amidst the foliage, might be seen the palmetto-thatched houses of its inhabitants glistening in the sun that had bleached them to a dazzling whiteness. The vale was more than three leagues in length, and about a mile across its greatest width. Everywhere below me, from the base of the precipice upon whose very verge I had been unconsciously reposing, the surface of the vale presented a mass of foliage, spread with such rich profusion that it was impossible to determine of what description of trees it consisted. But perhaps there was nothing about the scenery I beheld more impressive than those silent cascades, whose slender threads of water, after leaping down the steep cliffs, were lost amidst the rich foliage of the valley. Over all the landscape there reigned the most hushed repose, which I almost feared to break, lest, like the enchanted gardens of the fairy tale, a single syllable might dissolve the spell."

Deciding to challenge their luck, they disclosed themselves to the natives, and were hospitably received, but later discovered that they were not at liberty to leave the valley. Toby, however, managed to escape on a passing whaler, and the two friends did not meet again for many years:

For four months Melville was held in friendly captivity by the Typees. His swollen leg was healed by native doctors—but not without prolonged pain and anxiety—he was fed, he was amused, he was lionized by the valley. His hosts were savages; they were idolaters, they were inhuman beasts who licked their lips over the roasted thighs of their enemies; and at the same time they were crowned with flowers, sometimes exquisite in beauty, courteous in manners, and engaged all day long in doing not only what they enjoyed doing, but what, so far as Melville could judge, they had every right to enjoy doing. With Toby, Melville was consigned to the household of Kory-Kory. Kory-Kory, though a tried servitor and faithful valet, was, Melville admits, in his shavings and tattoos, a hideous object to look upon—covered all over with fish, fowl, and monster, like an illustrated copy of Goldsmith's "Animated Nature."

Uncertainty as to his friend's fate, whom he had last seen going down to the beach in company with the natives, and the insistence of his hosts on his conversion to heathendom, decided Melville to seize the first opportunity of escape:

Among the bachelors of the Ti, the men's club of the valley, he chatted, he smoked, he drowsed: he witnessed the Feast of the Calabashes when, for the liveliest day "the drums sounded, the priests chanted, and the multitude roared and feasted"—a scene reminiscent of a university wholeheartedly given over to "campus activity." A mock battle was staged for his diversion. He entered the funeral fastnesses where the effigies of former heroes eternally paddled canoes adorned by the skulls of their enemies. He mused by pools, splashing with laughing bronze nymphs. Yet withal, Melville was a captive in the valley. His lameness, too, returned. His hosts began to make friendly but insistent suggestions that he be tattooed—a suggestion superlatively repugnant to him. He heard, moreover, the clamor of a cannibal feast, and lifted the cover of a tub under which lay a fresh human skeleton. Under these circumstances he taught old Marheyo two English words: Home and Mother. But he did not complete the trinity. Forsan et haec olim meminisse juvabit. It was time for him to depart.

In the meantime, captivity was not without its compensations:

There also belonged to the household three young men, "dissipated, good-for-nothing, roystering blades of savages," and several girls. Of these Melville has immortalized Fayaway, his most constant companion. He has anatomized her charms in the manner of his "First Fragment from a Writing-Desk." But it is Fayaway in action, not Fayaway in still life, that survives in the imagination. At Melville's intercession, the taboo against women entering a boat was lifted. Many hours they spent together swimming, or floating in the canoe; diversions heightened in their heinousness by the fact that Fayaway for the most part clung to the primitive and summer garb of Eden—and the costume became her. Nor did Melville's depravity cease with his unblushing approval of nakedness. "Strange as it may seem," Melville writes in the '40s, "there is nothing in which a young and beautiful female appears to more advantage than in the act of smoking." Fayaway not only smoked, but she smoked a pipe, as they drifted in the canoe. One day, as they were gliding along, Fayaway "seemed all at once to be struck with a happy idea. With a wild exclamation of delight, she disengaged from her person the ample robe of tappa which was knotted over her shoulder (for the purpose of shielding her from the sun), and spreading it out like a sail, stood erect with upraised arms in the head of the canoe. We American sailors pride ourselves upon our straight clean spars, but a prettier mast than Fayaway made was never shipped aboard of any craft." John La Farge has painted Fayaway in this attitude.

Rumor of his plight reaching the captain of an Australian ship that had stopped at the island, a ransom was offered for him, but the natives refused it and fought a landing party to prevent his withdrawal. He succeeded in pushing off, however, in one of the boats, and reached the ship, though not without being forced to kill one of his friendly captors. His discovery, long afterwards, that Toby had not been injured by the islanders, and that they had contemplated no violence toward himself, added to the regret with which he looked back on his escape. And even at this time the contrasts between the clean pastoral life of the valley and the sordid filth of the ship that had rescued him in order to enlist his service in a short-handed crew filled him with remorse:

Though later, when Melville was a sailor in the United States Navy, he touched at the Marquesas, he never again set foot within the valley of the Typee. Melville had known the Typees in their uncorrupted glory—strong, wicked, laughing, loving, and clean. Mr. O'Brien visited Typee not many years ago, to find it pathetically fallen from its high estate. "I found myself," he says, "in a loneliness indescribable and terrible. No sound but that of a waterfall at a distance parted the sombre silence. . . . Humanity was not so much absent as gone, and a feeling of doom and death was in the motionless air, which lay like a weight, upon leaf and flower. The thin, sharp buzzing of the nonos was incessant." Mr. O'Brien discovered in the heart of the valley fewer than a dozen people who sat within the houses by coconut-husk fires, the acrid smoke of which daunted the nonos. "They have clung to their lonely paepaes despite their poverty of numbers and the ferocity of the nonos. They had clearings with cocoanuts and breadfruits, but they cared no longer to cultivate them, preferring rather to sit sally in the curling fumes and dream of the past. One old man read aloud the 'Gospel of St. John' in Marquesan, and the others listlessly listened, seeming to drink in little comfort from the verses, which he recited in the chanting monotone of their uta. . . . Nine miles in length is Typee, from a glorious cataract that leaps over the dark buttress wall where the mountain bounds the valley to the blazing beach. And in all this extent of marvelous fish land, there are now this wretched dozen natives, too old or listless to gather their own food."

Thou hast conquered, O Galilean!

After a mutiny in which Melville and the ship's doctor were implicated, these two found themselves at loose ends in Tahiti. Here Melville had an opportunity to observe at leisure the relations between Christianity and Heathendom, and to form some unorthodox opinions:

It is Melville's contention that the very traits in the Tahitians which induced the London Missionary Society to regard them as the most promising subjects for conversion were, in fact, the most serious obstruction to their ever being Christians. "An air of softness in their manners, great apparent ingenuousness and docility, at first misled; but these were the mere accompaniments of an indolence, bodily and mental; a constitutional voluptuousness; and an aversion to the least restraint; which, however fitted for the luxurious state of nature, in the tropics, are the greatest possible hindrances to the strict moralities of Christianity." Of the Marquesans, Melville says in "Typee": "Better it will be for them to remain the happy and innocent heathens and barbarians that they now are, than, like the wretched inhabitants of the Sandwich Islands, to enjoy the mere name of Christians without experiencing any of the vital operations of true religion, whilst, at the same time, they are made the victims of the worst vices and evils of civilized life."

Paul Gauguin, in his "Intimate Journals," seems to share Melville's conviction that the Polynesians are disqualified by nature to experience "any of the vital operations of the spirit." In speaking of the attempts of the missionaries to introduce marriage into Polynesia he remarks cynically: "As they are going out of the church, the groom says to the maid of honor, 'How pretty you are!' And the bride says to the best man, 'How handsome you are!' Very soon one couple moves off to the right and another to the left, deep into the underbrush where, in the shelter of the banana trees and before the Almighty, two marriages take place instead of one. Monseigneur is satisfied, and says, 'We are beginning to civilize them.'"

For the attitude of the lay representatives of Christendom toward the pagan islanders he had nothing but scorn:

"Indeed, it is almost incredible the light in which many sailors regard these naked heathens. They hardly consider them human. But it is a curious fact that the more ignorant and degraded men are, the more contemptuously they look upon those whom they deem their inferiors." John G. Paton records in his "Autobiography" how, in 1860, three traders gleefully told him that to humble the natives of Tanna, and to diminish their numbers, they had let out on shore at different ports, four men ill with the measles—an exceedingly virulent disease among savage peoples. "Our watchwords are," these jolly traders said, "sweep the creatures into the sea, and let white men occupy the soil." This sentiment belongs more to a fixed human type than to a period, of course; and that type has frequently taken to sailing strange seas. In treachery, cruelty, and profligacy, the exploits of European discoverers contain some of the rosiest pages in the history of villainy.

He credited the missionaries with disinterested sincerity, but doubted the value of their work and their fitness for it:

As a result of this labor idolatry was done away with; the entire Bible was translated into Tahitian; the morality of the islanders was, on the whole, improved. These accomplishments Melville freely admits. But in temporal felicity, "the Tahitians are far worse off now than formerly; and although their circumstances, upon the whole, are bettered by the missionaries, the benefits conferred by the latter become utterly insignificant, when confronted with the vast preponderance of evil brought by other means." Melville found that there was still at Tahiti freedom and indolence; torches brandished in the woods at night; dances under the moon, and women decked with flowers. But he also found the missionaries intent upon the abolition of native amusements and customs—said to have been first contrived and recommended by the missionaries' wives; a report which, I really trust, is nothing but a scandal." To Melville's eyes, Tahiti was neither Pagan nor Christian, but a bedraggled bastard cross between the vices of two incompatible traditions. And in this blend he saw the promise of the certain extinction of the Polynesians. The Polynesians themselves were not blind to the doom upon them. Melville had heard the aged Tahitians singing in a low sad tone a song which ran: "The palm trees shall grow, the coral shall spread, but man shall cease."

And his view of native susceptibility to Christian morality is well summarized in this tale:

At church Melville had observed, among other puzzlingly incongruous performances, a young Polynesian blade standing up in the congregation in all the bravery of a striped calico shirt, with the skirts rakishly adjusted over a pair of white sailor trousers, and hair well anointed with coconut oil, ogling the girls with an air of supreme satisfaction. And of those who ate of the bread-fruit of the Eucharist in the morning, he knew several who were guilty of sad derelictions the same night. Desiring, if possible, to find out what ideas of religion were compatible with this behavior, he and the Long Doctor called upon three sister communicants one evening. While the doctor engaged the two younger girls, Melville lounged on a mat with Ideea, the eldest, dallying with her grass fan, and improving his knowledge of Tahitian.

"The occasion was well adapted to my purpose, and I began. 'Ah, Ideea, mickonaree oee?' the same as drawing out—'By the by, Miss Ideea, do you belong to the church.'"

"Yes, me mickonaree," was the reply.

"But the assertion was at once qualified by certain reservations; so curious that I can not forbear their relation. 'Mickonaree ena (church member here), exclaimed she, laying her hand upon her mouth, and a strong emphasis on the adverb. In the same way, and with similar exclamations, she touched her eyes and hands. This done, her whole air changed in an instant; and she gave me to understand, by unmistakable gestures, that in certain other respects she was not exactly a 'mickonaree.'"

Mr. Weaver's book is a treasury of information on Melville's career and is an interesting estimate of his genius. If at times his criticism overreaches itself in a desire for sparkle and emphasis, this is an attractive fault, and does not lessen the charm and value of the biography.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending February 18, 1922 (five days) were $130,000,000; Saturday's clearings were $22,800,000.

At the entrance of every business house, every manufacturing plant, every producing industry in America, for several years past, have stood two robber barons, Labor and Government (says the Farmers and Merchants National Bank of Los Angeles in its monthly letter). One extorted inflated wages, the other unjust taxes. They both required payment in cash. Neither would accept as payment an interest in the plant, in raw ma-wheels of commerce go round, and furnished employment to those whose skill and labor is their capital. It has eaten into industrial capital until it is unable to function, or is unwilling to longer play the unequal game. The patronage of the government has been largely surrendered to, and is still enjoyed and monopolized by organized labor. The avowed object of the latter is to curtail output and increase wages. The burden of supporting the government and paying its debts has been imposed upon a small minority of our population. The retail merchants have charged what seems to the buying public an outrageous profit on their wares, but in justice to the retailer be it remembered that his labor has been both costly and inefficient; his taxes of all kinds have largely increased; his telephone, electric light, and stationery bills are heavier than ever before. Still with shellac selling at $3.25 per gallon in Los Angeles City, the retailer at Alhambra, eight miles distant therefrom, must be making some profit when he charges $5.25 per gallon for the same article. The little things in this world count. The sum of the little things make up the big things. With hogs selling at 7 cents per pound on foot, a 200-pound hog ought not to bring $35 retail.

While our lawmakers, in their frantic efforts to gain votes, have saddled the burden of running the government and paying its debts on the wealthy, who have fewer votes than the exempted classes, they overlook the fundamental proposition that, in the end, the consumer pays the taxes. Adam Smith lays down this doctrine so plainly in his "Wealth of Nations" that the dullest mind must be convinced by reading what he says on the subject.

Where producers, manufacturers, wholesalers, retailers, and distributors recoup their taxes out of their sales, naturally, in fixing prices, they have to provide for contingencies which may or may not occur. Mind you, the taxes of each party through whose hands goods pass are pyramided onto the final consumer. The sums thus added to the selling price of general commodities account, in part, for the high price to consumers at which these commodities are retailing. These prices form an excuse for the continuance of war-time wages. Thus, everybody is milling around in a vicious circle, and getting deeper into the quagmire of debt, inefficiency, and disgust for our methods of taxation, without any benefit to themselves. A moderate income tax without exemptions, without any excess profits or surtax, coupled with a sales tax, would give the government all the revenue needed, be a just tax, because it would be uniform, remove friction, and decrease the irritation and distress caused by the present income-tax laws. But taxation as above outlined would not bring a President, a senator, or a congressman, desirous of reelection the votes of the masses who are now, as far as direct taxation is concerned, a privileged class.

If the soldiers' bonus measure is passed, and it probably will be, we may get a sales tax on top of our other taxes, and without any relief from the heavy burden already imposed thereby. If so, this result will follow as another congressional sop to attract votes. Already Senator Frank P. Flint, Hiram Johnson's campaign manager in this district, is shouting from the housetops how loyally Johnson has stood for the soldiers' bonus. The only object of this announcement is to get votes.

Hearings before the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives on the constitutional amendment to make state and municipal bonds subject to taxation closed on January 28th, and the proceedings are now ready for distribution. Early favorable action by the committee is expected.

"Street-car fares would be lower and electric light and gas cheaper if public utilities were not compelled to compete with tax-exempt securities in the money markets," said P. H. Gadsden of Philadelphia, representing utility associations. He stated that some companies had been obliged to pay 12 per cent. for money because investors who had formerly purchased their bonds now prefer 5 per cent. tax-exempt securities.

Tax experts, farmers, financiers, a labor representative, and treasury officials testified that the national treasury, states, and taxpayers would be benefited by abolishing tax-exemptions.

Congressman McFadden, author of the resolution, was the first of nearly twenty witnesses who argued in favor of the amendment. Secretary of the Treasury Mellon and former Assistant Secretary Leffingwell declared that it would improve financial conditions and reduce general taxation if government securities were taxed. Mr. Leffingwell said that tax exemption impairs government credit by reducing its resources. He stated that the government would be better off if it had made all liberty loans taxable.

Dr. Edwin Seligman of Columbia University also insisted that the national government made a serious blunder in making Liberty Bonds exempt from taxation. He demonstrated that the Federal treasury is losing $300,000,000 a year by loss of taxes in excess of the gains received through reduced interest rates. He proved that the continued exemption of state and municipal bonds would soon seriously impair the taxing resources of states and the nation.

Representatives of the National Association of Real Estate Boards said that home-building in cities has been restricted and rents raised because investors buy tax-exempt securities instead of loaning on new buildings.

Expert statisticians showed that the farm mortgages of the country are now $8,000,000,000 and that the Federal Land Banks are carrying $415,000,000, only 5 per cent. of the total amount. Ninety-five per cent. of the farmers are paying higher interest rates and higher taxes because capital is diverting to tax-exempt securities. Annual issues of tax-exempt state and municipal bonds increased five-fold from $262,818,844 in 1918 to $1,305,868,916 in 1921, with prospects of still further increases in 1922.

In view of the widespread belief that high railroad rates are largely responsible for the continuance of the business depression, and of the loud demand for immediate and sweeping reductions, it is interesting to notice that rejoinder from the roads is virtually—"we'd like to, but we can't."

Some freight rates have been reduced, to correct disarrangements as to localities and for economic reasons, but such an authority as President Daniel Willard of the Baltimore & Ohio holds that the roads can not wisely do more at present. And even if the Interstate Commerce Commission insists on reduction, we read on the financial page of the New York Evening Post, no effects are likely to be felt before the beginning of summer. "It will require some time for the commission to finish taking testimony and hearing arguments on this question. Then, if reductions are ordered, at least a month more will be necessary for the carriers to put the decision into effect." Returning to the railroad point of view, as expressed by Mr. Willard, we find him stating that "certainly the carriers in the Eastern region can not make a general reduction now which would be definitely helpful, and it is doubtful if any substantial reduction could be justified with reference to any one commodity or class of traffic." As this railroad man continues:

"American railroads have furnished the cheapest transportation service in the world; as to these deadened enterprises, goes empty-handed. The income tax, as levied and enforced, has in some instances killed the goose that laid the golden egg. It is unwise, because it is unjust. It is unfair, because it is not uniform. It is brutal, because it is murderous to the commercial and industrial world. they will do so again, and in fact they are doing so now. High as railroad charges are, they are not relatively higher than other prices are or were, and it is important to remember that they were the very last to go up, and in the nature of things can not be first to go down; they can and will participate in the downward movement of all prices. In my opinion, to accelerate this downward movement artificially at this time would injure the roads and not benefit the public. Railroad rates are and always were subject to economic laws, against which they can not prevail, and the mere operation of such laws and influences will tend constantly to bring about lower rates, just as has been the case, not only during the past year, but during all years of railway operation."

in Mr. Willard's opinion, tend to make the carriers unequal to caring for the present volume of traffic, which he considers not much over 75 per cent. of normal. While there may be some difference of opinion about the severity of the case as Mr. Willard puts it, the Commercial and Financial Chronicle believes "that he is right in the general statement and that any attempt to force conclusions would tend to disaster instead of relief."

At the annual meeting of the stockholders of the William R. Staats Company a report of the business for the year just ended was made showing a large and increasing volume of business at the several offices of the company located at Pasadena, Los Angeles, San Francisco, and San Diego. A financial statement reflecting the highly prosperous condition of the company was submitted to the stockholders; a substantial amount was carried to surplus and undivided profits in addition to dividends paid.

The new office building now being erected by the company on East Colorado Street, to be occupied by the First National Bank and the William R. Staats Company for its permanent Pasadena office, is nearing completion.

The retiring board of directors, composed of William R. Staats, John Earle Jardine, Frank C. Monroe, J. W. Edminson, Lloyd R. Macy, J. E. Coggeshall, B. G. McMechen, John S. Staats, and Harry B. Brooks, was re-elected for the ensuing year.

At the organization meeting of the directors, held immediately after the stockholders' meeting, the following officers were elected: William R. Staats, chairman; John Earle Jardine, president; Frank C. Monroe, vice-president; J. W. Edminson, vice-president; Lloyd R. Macy, vice-president; J. E. Coggeshall, vice-president; B. G. McMechen, treasurer; John S. Staats, secretary; Thomas K. Gally, assistant treasurer; Robert G. Thomas, assistant secretary; Ray C. Maple, assistant secretary.

The only change in the executive personnel was the addition of Ray C. Maple as assistant secretary. Mr. Maple has been with the company for some years past.—Pasadena Star-News.

An instance of the enormous tax burden carried by the public utilities of California under the law which throws upon the corporations the entire cost of state government is furnished by the Pacific Gas and Electric Company in forwarding to Sacramento, on the 4th instant, the sum of $1,257,660.78, representing the second installment of state taxes paid by that company for the fiscal year 1921-22. In discussing the matter A. F. Hockenbeamer, second vice-president and treasurer of the company, has this to say:

"It is worth while to call public attention to the fact that this payment, large as it is, covers only one-half of what the Pacific Gas and Electric Company pays to the state for a single year's operations. Our taxes for the year, including state and county taxes, franchise taxes, Federal taxes, etc., will probably not run short of three and one-half million dollars."

The William R. Staats Company are offering $150,000 Lagunitas Development Company first closed mortgage 7 per cent. bonds, tax exempt in California, dated January 1, 1922, and due January 1, 1932. The price is 98 and interest, yielding in excess of 7.25 per cent.

These bonds in the opinion of counsel are secured by a first closed mortgage of all of the company's properties, consisting of approximately 4800 acres of land located in the San Geronimo Valley, Marin County, on the Point Reyes line of the Northwestern Pacific Railroad (broad gauge) twenty-one miles from San Francisco, together with the plant and properties of the San Geronimo Valley Water Company, and assignment of sales contracts having an estimated value of $80,000.

The company has expended in improvements approximately $125,000, which is taken into consideration in placing the appraisals above mentioned.

The Red Seal Refining Company has been organized under the laws of California with an authorized capital of $1,500,000, divided into 1,000,000 shares of common stock and 500,000 of 8 per cent. preferred stock. The stock is being placed upon the market for the purpose of building a refining plant at Los Angeles harbor. The location at Los Angeles Harbor is within a few miles of the new fields at Huntington Beach, Signal Hill, and Point Firmin, with the best shipping facilities both by rail to the interior and water for coastwise and export trade, although the entire product will be consumed locally for the present. The preferred stock constitutes a first lien on all the earnings and assets of the company. The company is obligated to pay 8 per cent. on all preferred stock before applying any earnings to dividends on common stock, and in the event of sale or liquidation the preferred stockholders shall first be paid 100 cents on the dollar with all accrued interest before any funds are applied to common stock.

Mr. R. B. Barr, manager of the Los Angeles office of the investment banking house of Cyrus Peirce & Co., and Mr. Douglas Alexander, manager of the Seattle office of the same firm, have both left for their respective headquarters following a short business visit to this city.

The Fat Man's Club of Paris now has fifty-eight members, including three women. Members must weigh at least 200 pounds and the president tips the beam at 290.

BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

Now that the psychologists have inherited the earth all the world is learning to speak, and what is more to think, in their language. A few years ago one would have written "jargon," but it is indicative of the completeness of their conquest that we have begun to treat them respectfully. Moreover, a few years ago it was jargon to us. Nowadays even our grandparents know what a complex is. In the early days of the conquest the most learned of us talked psychology with something of the hard temerity with which we essay French or German. Few could honestly boast that we thought psychology. Now all that is changed. Psychology is more than a language; it is the great white light that illumines everything. How in the world did we previously get along? How did we have any intelligent criticism, to say nothing of any intelligent art? Indeed, that mystery is one of the few that the master science has not cleared up. We did get along somehow. Perhaps our subconscious minds took care of literature, for example. But there is no denying that the thing called literature today is very different from its prototype B.F. That means before Freud and is probably the fashion in which our peculiar era will be designated and divided by posterity.

One of the most radical differences the new age has brought in is in the matter of fiction. Hitherto one read fiction for relaxation or aesthetic appreciation. Most people read for the former; the highbrows read for the latter. That deplorable class—whom, by the way, Shaw candidly says his plays are written for—was apt to find aesthetic exhilaration in squalor and misery. I suppose it made them feel doubly comfortable by contrast. The rest of humanity frankly liked a pleasant theme and a "happy ending." The ending, of course, is the crucial test of a book. If you don't care how it ends, the story is indubitably a failure. If you do care you want it to end happily. That is a logical explanation of the very human love of a "happy ending." But the psychological explanation is different. Psychologically, a taste, a penchant for anything is a complex, and there is usually a more or less discreditable reason or cause for the complex. Psychologically, we like happy endings because we are cowards, because we dread to be reminded of death or the wages of sin, because, in short, we have bad consciences. The psychoanalysts have declared it so, and it may or may not be true. One used to think that he liked a joyous termination because he had human sympathies and because the author had created lifelike puppets. Not so. The dark but therefore real reason that we wished those figments of an author's brain well was not because we loved our fellow-man, but because we loved ourselves. We identified the characters according to our sex, lost ourselves in their deeds and misdeeds, acquired their conscience, which more or less fitted our own, and finally suffered their fate. Naturally, say the psychologists, we want a "happy ending."

But the matter did not end by an explanation, half-heartedly embraced. The doctrine of the complex is slow but insidious. Once an author or a reader had accepted it, there was only one thing left for a self-respecting student of literature—to kill the happy ending. If the foolish, pleasant thing had got one into such a pass, why, one could only face it out and have any number of horrible finishes. A taste for tragedy ought to clear our characters. Hence—our current school of morbid squalor. That is both the logical and the psychological explanation.

Disowning science as an aid to literary criticism and getting back to literary standards, there is still a problem as regards endings. It has been urged that a story or a theme contains its inevitable end, as a matter of course. That an arbitrary ending is bad art is indubitably true. The old melodramatic thing, full of horrible possibilities and automatic escapes, but always terminating with magical ease and eternal happiness, is not the image to conjure up when one speaks—artistically, of course—of happy endings. Nowadays the arbitrary unhappy end is more of a literary monster because it is ubiquitous and unnatural. True, most of us are failures and unhappy. At least we are failures when we are unhappy, which is when we admit the truth. But to mechanically end a novel tragically because most lives are tragic is as silly as to end one happily because most people are unhappy. Besides, the former is more ill-natured. One does not paint the Mediterranean green because more people live on the Pacific. The end of a novel should be in the same color as the theme.

Still another phase of the tortured subject has been turned to view by a young author, Elizabeth Hepburn. Her interesting theory is that happy endings are not less real than sad ones, since almost any life contains a few happy spots. The trick is to conclude at the psychological moment when your puppets are dancing to a gay tune. After all, that is precisely what the older novelists did. Lacking the lurid light of a complex to brighten the literary path, they trusted to imagination, to instinct, to, I suppose, the subconscious mind, since we must use the language of our conquerors in order at least to be understood by the rising generation. The old formula, "and they lived happily ever after," was not unrealistic either. They thought they would. And, according to the philosophers—if one may ring in still another brand of scientists—thought is the only thing that matters, anyway. So it resolves as everything else in the world does to a matter of taste—happy endings for happy people, sad ones for the rest of us, and horrid, arbitrary ones for the highbrows. R. G.

Notes of Books and Authors.

The February publications of Small, Maynard & Co. include "The Witch Man," a novel of the Virginia mountains, by Margaret Belle Houston; "The Angel of Terror," by Edgar Wallace; "The Future of the Novel," edited by Meredith Starr, which gives the opinion of the leading English novelists on the future of their art; and "Success," by Lord Beaverbrook.

Writing of Herman Melville and his great sea stories, "Moby Dick," "Typee," and "Omoo," which have been recently reprinted in the Everyman's Library (Dutton's), in the Literary Review, Carl Van Vechten says: "The neglect of this figure, in my opinion indubitably the most important in the annals of United States literature, even in America, where it is almost a tradition to neglect the great, is one of the outstanding disgraces in our literary history."

Leonie Aminoff's novel, "Torchlight," published last summer by the Duttons, wove into its remarkably vivid story, with its background and action of the French Revolution, a picture of the youth of Napoleon. It was announced then that the novel was the first of a series whose central theme was to be Napoleon's life and character. The second volume, to be called "Love," is announced for spring publication by the Duttons. "Torchlight" closed with the end of the Revolution, the release of Josephine and others from prison just in time to save them from the guillotine, and her expectation of meeting their savior. The forthcoming story will deal with their romance and marriage and his rise to power.

Among the books announced for early issue by the Cornhill Publishing Company are "From Waterloo to the Marne," by Count Pietro Orsi, and "The A B C of Collecting Old English China," by J. F. Blacker. "The Medicine Way of the Palefaces," by Marion Reid Girardot, is a new novel by the author of "Steve of the Bar G Ranch." Other works of fiction to be published by the same company are "Beside the Tidewater," by Philip Hubbard, and "The Stronger Light," by Mary A. Balch.

Although Ovid forms the basis of much of our English literature, strangely enough there has never been an adequate metrical translation of his "Metamorphoses." That is why the forthcoming translation (Cornhill Publishing Company) is awaited with unusual interest in literary circles where the classics still hold their own. The translator, Brookes More, himself a well-known poet, has not only given to this work the best part of his twenty years of labor, but he has brought to the task a natural appreciation and kinship with the older poet that bids fair to make the com-

Harold Nicolson, author of "Sweet Waters" (Houghton Mifflin Company), is already known in America as the writer of a short study of "Paul Verlaine"—a book of power and beauty. In England he is well known also as a rising young diplomat, the son of Lord Carnock. It is his diplomatic experiences that form the basis for "Sweet Waters." Balkan intrigue, Turks, New and Old, Levantine and Englishmen—where could an author who knows the ground find more charming material for a novel?

Since James Joyce attracted attention with "Dubliners," a volume of short stories, no Irishman has made so pronounced an impression in fiction as Daniel Corkery. His "The Hounds of Banba" (B. W. Huebsch) consists of short stories that fix the Irish revolution for history as no conventional history can do. The Sinn Fein movement as it stirred the heart and mind of the nation provides the themes for tales which are likely to endure as the contributions of art to the psychology of the revolution. They reproduce the troubled soul of the Irish people during their great historical crisis.

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

Europe—Whither Bound?

Despite a disposition to be more or less "fed up" on books on Europe's plight one is apt to find Stephen Graham's new book both interesting and instructive. The chief interest of the book lies in its "news" quality. Europe is in such a fluid state that only the very latest reports are of any value to the practical reader. Mr. Graham has but very lately completed a tour of the capitals of Europe, and his book is composed of letters written on the spot of his observations.

Mr. Graham first tapped the stream of European conditions at Athens. The new Greece since the fall of Venizelos is presented to us—not exactly an attractive picture. "You do not hear a good word said for the Greek by any race in Europe," says Mr. Graham. At Constantinople we catch a glimpse of "a city now of appalling unhappiness and misery."

Naturally, the chapter on Germany is one of supreme interest. Berlin is not the city it was. From being perhaps the cleanest and most orderly city on the Continent it has become one of dirty streets and unkempt people and one of broken regulations. Mr. Graham graphically sums up the change in Berlin—"a city that had no slums and no poor in 1914 now becoming a slum en bloc." And yet, strange to say, every one is employed.

The letter from London is equally illuminating. "You would hardly think that England herself was in mortal danger. London astonishes the traveler." Our traveler's main impression is one of frivolity and materialism carried to the Nth degree. There is a neurotic interest in sport, and particularly in gambling. "England loses matches, and the nation seems as much plunged in gloom as she was at the failures of the old South African war." Nor is even secondary public interest in vital matters. After sport divorce is the great attraction. In fact one begins to realize, perhaps only dimly, that England is in a very bad way. Her greater material advantages over other European nations has partially served to blind us to the issue. England is probably now where the Continent was a generation ago. Today, even France is sobered and the rest of Europe is melancholic, but England has risen to hitherto unknown heights of extravagant pleasure-seeking.

Mr. Graham has certainly rendered us a service in sketching so vividly and so intelligently the Europe of the latter half of 1921.

Foster on Auction.

A great deal has been written on auction, but most of it has been based on the older theories of bridge and whist. Mr. Foster shows that auction is basically different from these earlier games, and that actual analysis of results proves the ancient conventions unsound and misleading when applied to auction play. He established the fact that every hand in auction has a fixed value for attack or defense, which can be absolutely depended on to yield a certain return in tricks to the player who understands these values and bases his bids upon them. Mr. Foster's work finally puts auction on a scientific basis.

Masterpieces of Modern Spanish Drama.

"The Great Galeoto" is familiar to English readers, but despite even the new interest in Spanish literature due to Jacinto Benaventi's recent capture of the Nobel Prize there are not many translations of Spanish plays into English. Spanish literature is among the most untranslated of European schools. So that a new edition of such a book as "Masterpieces of Modern Spanish Drama" is always welcome. One's only regret is that there are but three plays included. These three, however, were selected with discrimination. They represent three of the varied aspects of modern Spanish genius, Echegaray, Goldós, and Guimera, the Catalan nationalist. Two of the plays—the "Duchess of San Quentin," by Benito Pérez-Goldós, and "Daniela," by Angel Guimera—were never translated into English before the publication of this volume. And it is for these we particularly rejoice. "The Great Galeoto," splendid thing though it is, was available before. The present volume is a new edition of Barrett H. Clark's collection, to which he has contributed a new preface.

A Fallacy Concerning Russians.

In a review of "The Note-Books of Anton Chekhov" and the "Reminiscences of Chekhov," by Gorky, Kurpin, and Bunin (B. W. Huebsch), in the New York Evening Telegram, Frederick James Gregg, critic of books and art, points out the absurdity of the common notion that Russians are "gloomy." "Chekhov," says Mr. Gregg, "is the most charming personality to be found anywhere among the writers of high rank in the period that ended with the great war." He speaks of the "wise optimism" of Chekhov, quoting from a description by the "bitter Gorky" of Chekhov in his garden in the Caucasus:

"His love was not that of a proprietor; it was something else—a mightier and wiser consciousness. He would often say, looking at his orchard with a twinkling eye: 'Look, I have planted each tree here, and certainly they were dear to me. . . . But this is of no consequence. Before I came here all this was waste land and ravines, all covered with stones and thistles. Then I came and turned this wilderness into a cultivated, beautiful place. . . . Do you know that in three or four hundred years all the earth will become a flourishing garden? And life will then be exceedingly light and comfortable." And yet this was the man whom many Western critics used to describe as a "pessimist."

A museum will be opened in Paris this year in the Avenue des Gobelins. It will not be an orangerie like the Luxembourg or a residence like the Louvre, but a building especially designed for museum purposes, and will contain a collection of the old tapestries woven by the Gobelins towards the end of the fifteenth century on the banks of the Bièvre, a little stream now hardly better than a sewer.

"THE RETURN OF PETER GRIMM."

David Belasco does not write great plays, but he unquestionably knows how to reach the hearts of his public. He does this in his near-great moments, which, in this play, happens in the middle act, when the shade of Peter makes agonizing efforts to communicate with those he loved, so that he could undo the mischief he had done in life by exacting a promise.

The story, it will be remembered, is that of an elderly, Dutch-descended tulip-grower, living in a Dutch-settled town in New York State. The promise was exacted from Kathrien, his deeply-loved adopted child—or adopted niece—who pledged herself, a short time before Peter's sudden death from a heart seizure, to marry his nephew, an individual whom all instinctively disliked except Peter. Peter had strong family feeling. The prosperous business had been carried on by his forbears for seven generations, and he wished it to continue in his family. Frederick, the nephew, thought otherwise, but concealed his sentiments from his uncle.

Death opened Peter's eyes to the dissimulation and cold-heartedness of Frederick, and to his own folly. He keeps the pact made to his doctor and old friend, Andrew MacPherson, to return, and in the brown shadows of the mellow old, wood-lined Dutch interior we see Peter, pathetically striving, striving to communicate his releasement of Kathie's pledge.

This is the supreme act of the play. Even the most frivolous spirits in an audience, on the avid search of a motive for laughter, feel the pathos of seeing that touching visitor from the shades, helpless in the home he had dominated, and unseen by the bright eyes of youth that he had so loved.

In this act David Belasco has drawn with remarkable success upon those resources of stagecraft in which he is so adept. It is not any too easy to create a supernatural atmosphere on the stage, but he has succeeded signally in doing so. A thunder storm and the coming of twilight unite to create thick shadows, and Kathie's grief and longing for her uncle suggest the familiar but lost presence. And suddenly it is there, standing in the midst of the family group, holding forth tentative arms, offering shadow caresses. The phantom speaks, and at first all ears are dull. But it gradually it seems as if the urge of the anguished spirit communicated itself to living ears and hearts.

The method by which Belasco has brought this situation about repays study, for it is full of admirable detail. The various personages on the stage, at different times, show an uneasy perception of an unseen presence, and once or twice they seem to obtain a momentary glimpse of Peter's yearning countenance.

Yet all the time Belasco, the master of stagecraft and the skilled feeler of the public pulse, so contrives as to make the ultimate success of the communication within the bounds of possibility.

Willem, the delicate boy—and, unknown to all, the illegitimate victim of Frederick's secret sin—is sensitive, emotional, and receptive to suggestion. This tender spirit is the one that finally hears and sees the phantom visitor. But—and here again Belasco's skill comes in—the sturdy repudiator of spiritual interference may easily prove that such beings as Willem have hallucinations, or intuitions; and that he fancied the bodiless presence with which the others heard him speaking. And thus no one can definitely accuse the author of countenancing spiritualism.

However that may be, the scene is one of strong dramatic interest, mysterious and delicately suggestive in its supernatural element; and the wistful appeal conveyed by the yearning dead and the suffering living reaches the sympathies with potent effect.

The final act registers a slight fall from the intensity of suspense created in the onlooker in the second act. This is almost inevitable, for a happy wind-up must too often make some demand upon the mechanics of drama-turgy, but the idea that Willem was the channel of communication between the quick and the dead because he was so near death was well in accord with the general scheme. And the close suggested coming felicity for the two troubled spirits.

The play first came out about ten years ago. The idea was suggested to Belasco by a rumor —never verified—that Professor William James had made a compact similar to Peter's and the doctor's with a fellow-scientist interested in psychical research. From this root idea Belasco constructed his plot, and the play attracted wide attention and moved audiences deeply.

Its present revival may be said to be timely, because the results of the war have turned many yearning hearts toward the hope that the dead can revisit the haunts of the living. Belasco's play, however, like Barrie's "Mary Rose" and like "Smilin' Through" can not help those mischievous harpies who, posing as spiritualists, prey on human sorrow. It is an interesting dramatic fancy most interestingly worked out. It offers a warning to pig-headed even if kind-hearted family autocrats not to meddle too much with human destinies. It discourages such pledges as Kathie made, and it pleases the bump of supernaturalism which timidly grows somewhere in the shadows of the human mind by endowing the departed shade with so human a yearning for those left behind that it bridges the gulf that yawns between life and death.

Mr. Belasco has sent out a good company with his play, some of the actors having been previously identified with the rôles. David Warfield, with his emotional temperament, evidently feels a kind of reverence for the rôle of Peter Grimm, which he no doubt loves. He lovingly endows it with innumerable fine touches, and seems born to play the rôle. So finely done are these brush-strokes of naturalness over his most pleasingly conceived portrait of Peter that it is regrettable that he allows his habit of bursting into a winding-up shout in order to create laughter degenerate into a mannerism. And in his determination that the thing should seem real and natural he allowed the pauses in his telephone interview to last too long.

But Warfield is an artist by temperament as well as achievement, and possesses for his audiences a singularly lovable personality. His hair has grown gray, nearly white; but one of his great charms is the engagingly child-like youth expressed in his most pleasing countenance.

Miriam Doyle is sweet and rather pretty, and has qualities appropriate to the character of Kathie, although one suspects that she is an "on the circuit" actress rather than a choice that would appear in a New York production. But she wept feelingly, and fitted into the Dutch interior. John Sainpolis, with that slight touch of Mephistophelianism that is indicated in his countenance, satisfied in the character of the dissimulative nephew. Joseph Brennan gave an admirably Scotch portrait of the doctor; Marie Bates, although in the rôle of Mrs. Bartholomew she had scarcely enough material for her skill as a character comedienne, amused in her brief scenes, and Richard Dupont, although rather long-legged for an eight-year-old boy, showed real dramatic talent and force in the scene in the second act in which the young player held the stage. Other players who pleased in more subordinate rôles are Messrs. Boag and Wellington, while Marie Reichardt played the faithful old Dutch retainer, and David Malcolm a lively clown.

A sign, perhaps, that the play is not thoroughly up to date is a lack of characterization in the rôles, for the subtlety of psychology in the depiction of character has developed greatly since Mr. Belasco wrote his play.

"THE LUCKY ONE."

We were rather lucky ones ourselves in seeing this play at the Maitland last week, for it contains an interesting phase of character contrast and the psychology that is provocative because it is veiled, as soul conditions in life are frequently veiled. "The Lucky One" is the drama of a clouded soul. It presents a family group and a few outsiders in natural relationships and there is plenty of incidental chit chat in the play, so that the general tone is that of comedy. But although the play seems to wear the dress of comedy, the underlying theme is essentially serious.

Two brothers are placed in contrast, the one brilliant and charming both professionally and socially, the other heavy, sombre, almost dull, but not lacking in a very clear and passionately jealous perception of his status as compared with that of his brother. It is a state of things for which the only remedy is surgery, for the overlooked one should always get out and transfer himself to a new environment.

But it is the result of going against nature, which intended that the young ones should flit from the parent nest when they begin overcrowding each other. Dark indeed must be the hidden record of these family rivalries that would have died of inanition if the various rivaling pairs had been normally separated.

In "The Lucky One" the author incites the spectator to further interest by leaving him groping for the clue to the real natures of the two brothers. In a rather leisurely first act he places the characters and their relationships, and perhaps rather drags things a little. We must remember, however—we do, indeed, realize afterwards—that the author is showing the instinctive attitude of all the characters to the two brothers. To the cheerful, lively, talkative, ready-witted, graceful-mannered, and agreeably but not effusively demonstrative Gerald they hand over unreserved liking, while rather overlooking his silent brother.

In the second act we are in a state of suspense. We know not the secrets of those deeply differing natures; while in the third the hearts of the two brothers are fully bared to each other, and in this soul revelation the looker-on is carried along with them on the tide of emotion that swept the concealing waves from the bare rocks of fundamental character.

Such plays as this make a strong appeal to the sympathies of players, who respond to the dramatic vitality which lies in character contrast, and the Maitland players made a particularly creditable appearance in "The Lucky One."

THE POWYS LECTURES.

Professor Powys is making considerable of a success with his present course of morning lectures, which deal in large part with up-to-date fiction. The English critic does not hesitate to administer knock-down blows to such fictional favorites as do not please him, having in particular seized "If Winter Comes" by the scruff of the neck and given it a vigorous shaking. But, though one can not but feel that the author too thoroughly invoked the wrath of the Furies against his hero, surely all must admire the fine touches in the depiction of the character of Mabel, and the contrast and instinctive antagonism in the natures of the married pair.

I have an idea as to why Professor Powys chewed up "If Winter Comes" into small bits. Mr. Hutchinson, the author, invoked that terrific shower of calamities upon Mark Sahre because he was going to give some happiness to Mabel's hapless ex-husband at the extreme end. Now Hutchinson as an author evidently has a Puritanic conscience. He felt that he was not justified in bestowing that lurking happiness until it was first earned by making Mark climb the hill of Calvary. So, his Puritanic conscience urging him on, he contrived so many calamities that the flesh and blood of readers finally rebelled.

But it was the evidence of a Puritanic conscience that caused the rebellion of Professor Powys, who seems to be a queer mixture of atheist, pagan, and aesthetic worshipper of the picturesque side of religious creeds. But he hates a Puritanic conscience as the devil hates holy water.

Professor Powys has a flair for selecting topics that please the many. Also, the result of past lecture tours has given the Oxford intellectual a following. Hence he is filling the Maitland Theatre on Tuesday and Friday mornings, and devout worshippers may hear him expound on what he thinks about such widely discussed books as "Main Street," "Miss Lulu Bett," and "Moon Calf" and its sequel, while those whose tastes include the well-seasoned favorites of an earlier era may listen to his verdict on Jane Austen's "Emma" or Hardy's "Jude the Obscure," while the rehabilitated "Jurgen" also has a hearing.

Although the professor seems to appeal more particularly to the tastes of women, a course of Sunday evening lectures on political and sociological subjects will give the men a chance to discover whether they can subscribe to the enthusiasms of their womenfolk, who greatly enjoy Professor Powys' fine diction.

GREEK DRAMA.

Lovers of the ancient Greek literature had a treat last week in listening to Miss Dorothea Spinney's recital of Euripides' "The Alcestis." This well-known interpreter, being gifted by nature with a fine voice and an appearance that lends itself to the effect created by Grecian costume, accomplished the appropriate atmosphere. The stage of the Maitland Theatre was hung with a dark, smoke-colored drapery, and against this the figure of the reciter was silhouetted with beautiful effect, the light but dimmed blue of her draperies making the required contrast.

Miss Spinney has evidently made a study of Greek poses, and the vision was frequently gratified by a pleased recognition of gestures and attitudes that have come down to us from famous designs on Greek coins and vases or on the entablature of some storied temple.

Added to the visual gratification afforded the spectators, the lady revealed a fine dramatic ability in conveying the warm humanity of the Euripidean characters.

On February 22d the talented interpreter will give "Hamlet," but, on the 24th, with "Medea," she returns again to the dramatic literature of the early Greeks.

CANADA AT THE CONFERENCE.

Will the new Canadian administration appoint a Canadian minister at Washington? (queries the Toronto correspondent of the Manchester Guardian). American correspondents have recently declared that the understanding of official Washington is that the movement to appoint a minister has been squelched on account of the disinclination of the British Foreign Office to permit the foreign policy of any of its dominions to be handled separately. Emphasis has also been placed on the argument that Canadian officials can gain easy access to the British ambassador, who at present, in the person of Sir Auckland Geddes, happens, through his previous residence in Canada, to have had facilities for becoming familiar with the Canadian viewpoint.

Commenting on the foregoing information, the Winnipeg Free Press makes the following pointed observations:

"There has been right along a suspicion in Canada that some powerful secret influence was being directed against the fulfillment of the Canadian government's policy of appointing a representative of the Dominion at Washington. Two Canadian premiers in succession, Sir Robert Borden and Mr. Meighen, favored this innovation. Twice the Canadian Parliament voted money for the maintenance of a Canadian minister at Washington. But the appointment was never made, and the explanations of the delay that were given out never had the ring of genuineness. The supposition that the opposition came from Downing Street was widely held. At the Imperial Conference last June, however, Mr. Lloyd George, speaking for the British government, formally welcomed the suggestion that Canada should be directly represented at Washington. The Foreign Office is, however, pretty much a law to itself, and it is highly probable that it has been putting difficulties in the way."

The Canadian government, it is recalled, declined to permit the publication of the correspondence with the British government relating to the proposed appointment. These documents will now be open to the Liberals, who, presumably, will make them public. The new government, adds the Winnipeg Free Press, will have a golden opportunity to demonstrate the quality of its Canadianism by making the appointment to Washington without further delay.

Elsewhere regret is expressed that the British Foreign Office, and in particular the embassy at Washington, should seem to be so irreconcilably opposed to Canada's proposal. It does not help the situation that the opposition is being carried on behind the scenes. For a time Canadians were loth to believe that such opposition existed, but there is now little room for doubt in the matter. How the new government will grapple with the problem this opposition has presented, and in what form it will seek solution, are questions whose answer will be awaited with interest. It may be taken for granted that the day is past when Canada will be content to remain as a minor sub-department of a department of the British government in the matter of foreign affairs.

The Columbia Theatre.

On Monday, February 27th, David Warfield will begin the second and final week of his engagement in "The Return of Peter Grimm." The play, which is from the pen of Mr. Belasco himself, is brought forward again, after an absence from the stage of several years, in response to many requests and because its theme is one that engages the interest of the public at the present time. Never before has there been so much conjecture upon the possibility of communication between the spiritual and the material worlds as there is now, and seldom has the subject been more beautifully treated than by the two master craftsmen of the theatre, Mr. Belasco and Mr. Warfield.

As Peter Grimm, the gentle old Dutch-American florist, who returns from the spirit world to help those he loved on earth, Mr. Warfield presents a characterization of the utmost sincerity and dramatic power. Mr. Belasco has personally supervised every detail of the production, and he has surrounded Mr. Warfield with a company of the first order. Among the players are Marie Bates, Miriam Doyle, Marie Reichardt, Joseph Brennan, John Sainpolis, George Wellington, John F. Webber, Richard Dupont, William Boag, and David Malcom.

The Orpheum.

Langdon McCormick's sensational play, "The Storm," will be presented next week. The play ran for a year in New York and had long runs in Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston, and other large cities. In "The Storm," which is now being presented in vaudeville as a feature attraction, Mr. McCormick has provided one of the most realistic fire effects ever witnessed. In this scene a forest fire is seen at first in the offing, creeping closer and closer to a log cabin where three people have been forced to remain for months. At the climax the fire bursts forth in all its fury. Blazing branches fall and the entire stage is a seething caldron of flames. A forest giant, one of the big trees, crashes with a shower of sparks through the roof of the cabin. For its presentation in vaudeville Mr. McCormick has provided a splendid cast, which includes Edward Arnold, Guy Cunningham, Miss Cecilia Franke, Max von Mitzel, Miss Isis Maynard, and a complete working crew of stage mechanics and electricians who are used to produce the sensational fire effect.

George N. Brown is the world's champion walker. He invented a machine, a sort of treadmill, by which he can hike on the stage, and with this apparatus he became one of the novelty successes in vaudeville. Since hiking became a favorite sport and a medically prescribed exercise, Mr. Brown's popularity has increased, because all pedestrians are anxious to see him and learn by observation the proper way of walking. Brown has done a mile in six minutes eight and two-fifths seconds, which is the world's record and almost a minute under the former record.

Burt Gordon and Gene Ford present a comedy skit, "Recital Classique." Miss Ford as a captivating singing teacher endeavors to teach Mr. Gordon, an impossible pupil, the vocal art.

One of the best-liked teams of colored comedians in the business was Cooper and Robinson. Now Robinson is going it alone. He sings, dances, and talks, and does all three as only one of his race can.

Jess Libonati, one of the acknowledged masters of the xylophone, devotes most of his programme to syncopation. It is probably more difficult to play ragtime on an xylophone than on any other instrument, as each note is caused by the tap of the xylophone sticks, and in ragtime there are twice as many notes to a measure as any other form of music.

The three big features of this week are being retained for a second week. Keane and Whitney in their extraordinary comedy travesty, "The Gossipy Sex"; Tom Patricola, "The Dancing Fool," whose comedy is unsurpassed in vaudeville annals, with Miss Irene Delroy, and La Bernicia with her excellent company in their classic dance features, all grace next week's programme, assuring, along with the five new acts and the feature, "The Storm," the most exceptional bill of the season.

Ethel Barrymore in "Déclassée"

Miss Barrymore is to be seen at the Columbia Theatre in "Déclassée" for a limited engagement beginning Monday evening, March 6th. The first performance of Ethel Barrymore in Zoe Akins' play, "Déclassée," at the New York Empire Theatre was accorded an ovation that has become an interesting fact of theatrical history. Throughout the entire season Miss Barrymore occupied the stage of the Empire Theatre, achieving the distinction of being the only star who ever opened and closed a season at the aristocratic Frohman playhouse, playing the same piece continuously. The New York première of "Déclassée" occurred in early October, and Miss Barrymore and the play remained at the Empire Theatre until late June of the following year. At Powers' Theatre in Chicago, later, Miss Barrymore established a new record for enormous attendance and receipts. For fifty consecutive performances there was not an unoccupied seat in the theatre, and twice the engagement was extended to meet the unparalleled demand for seats.

The Godowsky Concerts.

Leopold Godowsky, who is at present on a coast-to-coast concert tour, will give two recitals, on Tuesday night, March 21st, and on Sunday afternoon, March 26th, at the Scottish Rite Auditorium, under the local management of Frank W. Healy. Mr. Godowsky will sail on May 20th for a South American tour of at least twelve weeks this summer. Following his South American tour, Mr. Godowsky will make an extensive tour of the Orient, playing in China, Japan, India, and possibly a few other countries. He will not be heard again in the United States for several years.

On March 3d, 10th, 17th (Fridays) and March 5th, 12th, 19th (Sundays) the Ferriers will give in La Gaité Française the lyric drama "Werther," arranged from Goethe's famous romantic novel, "The Sorrows of Werther," the music by Massenet. A capable company of singers has been rehearsing, and the prospects are good for a performance that will be interesting both musically and dramatically.

Fritz Kreisler comes to San Francisco on Sunday afternoon (Easter Sunday), April 16th, for his only concert in Northern California. He will play at the Exposition Auditorium under the local management of Frank W. Healy.

THE VOYAGE OF THE "QUEST."

No polar expedition in history in all probability was ever so well equipped for determining scientific facts as is that of Sir Ernest Shackleton, whose death off the shores of South Georgia is announced in the news dispatches (says the Portland Oregonian). Final "discovery" of the two geographical spots known respectively as the North and South Poles having removed a particularly romantic incentive for that particular form of research, exploration in both hemispheres has recently taken a more scientific aspect, as has been evidenced in the north by Stefansson's recent work, by Roald Amundsen's plans for the future and by the supporters of Shackleton.

Attainment of material results was the prime purpose of the party which manned the Quest. Composed almost entirely of scientists, who were bent on navigating their own ship for the purpose of economizing personnel, this group of devoted humanitarians proposed to make science their sole guide. From the time that her head was pointed south from the Cape of Good Hope, the Quest entered upon a programme which included making a full hydrographic survey as well as a complete chart of the air currents, of exploring islands of the ocean which may have lain in silent oblivion since the very beginning of terrestrial time, of investigating the bird, animal, and marine life of those islands and their surroundings, and of recording their geological and magnetic phenomena. Meanwhile, so complete was the equipment of the voyagers, it was intended that a complete set of motion pictures should be obtained in order that the study might be continued by other scientists at home and the results be published in a form that should stimulate universal interest and awaken the popular imagination.

Concentration of interest upon the poles themselves has had the effect, as Stefansson has pointed out, of diverting attention from manifestly more important matters. Shackleton had dismissed the pole from his mind, so far as this voyage was concerned. His mission was to add as much as possible to the sum of human knowledge of a vast region of which only the fringes have been touched by men. From the day that he sighted first land in the Antarctic south of Africa his researches were to have been invested with romance of a different sort from that which commonly attends exploration having only a geographical goal in view. It had been nearly a century since a ship had been in the particular waters, and there were at least three thousand miles of coast line still only vaguely mapped. It may even now be disclosed that Sir Ernest discovered new seas before he died, and that he found new gulfs indenting that ice-bound coast. All that was known of the region was that it held one rocky cliff of interest, in Enderby Land, but it was not known whether this promontory, which was called Cape Anne, was part of the Antarctic continent or of an island. It was part of the mission of the Quest to find, if possible, new whaling harbors and to study the habits of the southern fur seal, which had disappeared from the better-known islands of the Antarctic owing to the wanton slaughter of a century ago.

A remarkable feature of the expedition has been mentioned. This is her almost absolute lack of a crew—that is, a crew in distinction from the scientific workers. The latter, however, are all men of large experience apart from their restricted callings. At least six were companions of Shackleton on former voyages and practically without exception the personnel have seen service in the army or navy in the world war. Captain Hussey, for example, who is mentioned as having accompanied the body of the commander to South America, is not only a distinguished meteorologist, but he also achieved high merit in the artillery in France. Lieutenant-Commander Stenhouse was with Mawson in the Aurora in 1910-12, and also commanded a "mystery ship" during the war. Major Macklin, the biologist on the Quest, was surgeon on the Endurance, on which Shackleton voyaged in 1914-17. Commander Wild, Shackleton's second in command and the probable present head of the Quest expedition, was with Scott in the Discovery, with Shackleton in the Nimrod, with Mawson in the Aurora, and with Shackleton with the North Russian forces during the war.

The Alice Seckels Matinee Musical.

The next Alice Seckels' matinee musical, on Monday afternoon, February 27th, in the Colonial Ballroom of the Hotel St. Francis, will introduce to San Francisco Vasa Prihoda, who became famous almost overnight. This young Bohemian was found playing for a meal in a restaurant in Italy, and in a concert that was arranged for him a month later Genoa turned out en masse to hear him. He toured the Continent with great success last season and is meeting with the same enthusiasm on his first tour of America.

The Powys Lectures.

There is speculation among the followers of John Cowper Powys as to whether or not at his Sunday evening lecture on the much-talked-of books, "Mirrors of Downing Street" and "Glass of Fashion," he will reveal the identity of the Man with the Duster, the anonymous author of these stories.

Powys is also giving timely literary lectures on modern fiction every Tuesday and Friday morning at 11 o'clock at the Maitland Theatre, under the management of Jessica Colbert. The subjects at the Friday morning lecture will be "Waddington of Wyck," "Emma," and "The Voyage Out." On Tuesday he will discuss "Moon Calf," "The Briary Bush," "Main Street," "Miss Lulu Bett," and "The Song of the Lark."

Powys himself is an author of distinction, having written essays, novels, and poems, among which the most popular are "Suspended Judgments," "Visions and Revisions," "Rodmore," "Wood and Stone," and "Wolf'sbane."

The Paul Elder Lectures.

W. L. George is coming to San Francisco to deliver a series of three lectures under the direction of Paul Elder. George is the author of "A Bed of Roses," "The Second Blooming," and "Ursula Trent," in which he discusses the intricacies of modern social life. His first lecture, on "The Intelligence of Woman," will be delivered Thursday evening, March 2d. Monday evening, the 6th, he will speak on "Love and Marriage." His last lecture is dated for Wednesday evening, March 8th, when he will lecture on "Anatole France."

If there is anything so out-moded as a play or a vaudeville act based on divorce and with scene in Reno that show or stunt will have to be revamped. Alexandria is now the thing. Reno is a back number. For the unenlightened, we explain that Alexandria is not an erstwhile unknown burg on the Mexican border, nor is it anywhere else in the tamed and close-shorn West. Alexandria had a history before Reno had a future. Alexandria, in short, is old enough to know better. For the new and most efficient divorce mill is located, alas, on the sacredly orthodox soil of Virginia. And this despite the fact that the state laws of Virginia require a year's residence before granting a divorce decree. But in this respect the part which is Alexandria is faster than the whole which is Virginia. A divorce, it is claimed, can be secured in Alexandria in forty-two days, which is supposed, moreover, not to be record time, but a fair average, provided, of course, the proper lawyer is selected. The moral is obvious: East is West. The process is said to be so amazingly simple—so, noiseless, expeditious, and inexpensive—particularly so noiseless—that for two years it has defied detection. It seems a pity that anything so efficient should now be called in question. But though the mills of Alexandria turn swiftly and those of justice in general emulate the gods' in their slowness, detection has nevertheless caught up with the shrewd lawyers of this refuge for the maritally unhappy. A committee of the bar association has been investigating charges that divorces have been obtained without any actual residence in the state on the part of the petitioners and upon the flimsiest sort of evidence. The charge is serious, and according to report well founded. The investigation has already revealed the significant fact that of corporation court cases Nos. 1141 to 1241—fairly recent cases taken at random—only one is reported other than a divorce case. At first blush it would seem that the fine old conservative society of Virginia was undermined. But we hasten to reassure those who believe in a Solid South. The cases are mostly imported. Divorce making is simply, or rather has been for the past several years, the main industry of sleepy little Alexandria in whose historic Christ Church George Washington was a vestryman. This fact, after all, is not shocking from a scientific viewpoint. Washington was a true American and divorce is the most characteristic contribution of our own United States to latter-day civilization. In fact it is rather fitting that the home of the father of our country should also be the home of American privilege. But even divorce should be legal. It is astonishing that its practitioners should be content with an illicit brand, since it is of the nature of divorce to be legal. Otherwise it is nothing. Of course the corporation court of Alexandria requires the petitioner to prove a year's residence, but one of the sad revelations that the investigating committee has made is that ex post facto residence in Alexandria is very, very cheap. A year's posterior rent is rated at about $30. And, too, notice of the divorce must be advertised in an Alexandria paper for four weeks. But that slight delay over, and armed with a year's rent receipt and some evidence—of more or less damning nature, of course—and the path of the would-be divorcé or divorcée is cleared. Or rather, was cleared, as one must persistently bring one's tenses up to date in this very current matter. No one knows what the divorce requirements of the near future will be in Alexandria. If the committee of the bar association is successful, doubtless more than "a nightie hung in a cupboard somewhere"—to quote one authority on the subject—and a bogus receipt will be required.

Statistics have it that San Francisco women use only a half-million dollars' worth of cosmetics annually. Figuring roughly on a population of half a million and making due allowance for sex and age, we calculate that three to four dollars is expended yearly by each woman. That would not go very far on powder alone—powder being the one cosmetic that is pretty generally allowed to every one. This is a new light on our calcimined beauties. How do they do it? Of course one must bear in mind that even in San Francisco there are a few women—probably in convents—who use no make-up whatever. That leaves a little more for their more artificial sisters. But it still remains astonishing. We suspect the drug store corporation of being poor statisticians. St. Louis is said to "consume" six times as much in the way of rouge, lipsticks, eyebrow pencils, etc. The question has been raised, do they put it on in strata? True, St. Louis is larger than San Francisco, which alters one's first impression. But is it even possible that the staid metropolis of the Middle West is as be-painted as are the belles of Powell Street? Can statistics lie or have our eyes deceived us?

It seems incredible, but the consensus of opinion is that whereas the American business man is among the most astute the world has ever known, the woman lags behind her British and Latin sisters when it comes to certain commercial enterprises which require deftness of judgment and calculating ability. There is that amazing example in England of the woman boniface, Lady Courtenay Honeywood, who has lifted a stupendous debt from her husband's estate, Ebington Place, in Kent, simply by taking over third-rate hotels about Ascot and on the Isle of Wight and making them over into the coziest inns, so long lamented by the traveling public. Every feature of the inns in the days of coaching she revived, and these picturesque adjuncts she filled in tiled bathrooms, electrical equipment in rooms and in kitchens; everywhere were home-made, embroidered and hemstitched napery and linen, and the fine British weave of rugs on the floors. Now it appears that Lady Honeywood sighs for new worlds to conquer, and she contemplates trying her hand at inns in various American mountain resorts—the Adirondacks, the Lake George region, and the surpassingly splendid opportunities offered in the Canadian Rockies. There are mammoth hotels everywhere, and after a conventional pattern they are mechanically perfect. But the guest is as a bee in a hive, and each of these hostleries resembles the other as closely as forest trees. Now, inns which will take only a limited number of guests, and these of what the British call the recommended class, would pay in this country, where even the most energetic and social get weary of the hurly-burly life of the hotel. But Lady Honeywood has no American counterpart.

A group of Continental architects has recently been studying the suburban houses about Philadelphia, the oldest and best developed type of country house to be found in the English-speaking part of this continent. It is little short of marvelous the way in which these dwellings, some of them more than two hundred years old, have been transformed into modern homes without losing an inch of their exterior beauty and the solid air of antiquity which is their chief charm. Mr. Charles Biddle of Torresdale has used an aged stone square mansion as central part for a great winged house, with roof gardens, terraces, sun parlors—every luxury of the era—and yet the old contour is unbroken. The system used by this group of architects is to modernize the interiors and fit them up with every detail required by modern civilization, while retaining the gardens, aged trees, shrubs, and outbuildings.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise

Sam, a colored "clicker," sold Mose a mule. A few days later Mose told Sam the mule was blind. "What makes yo' think dat dat mule is blind?" "Why, I turned him loose in a field, and he ran right into a tree." "Mose, dat mule aint blind. He just don't give a dam."

Pat was helping the gardener on a gentleman's place and, observing a shallow stone basin containing water, he inquired what it was for. "That," said the gardener, "is a bird bath." "Don't ye be foolin' me," grinned Pat. "What is it?" "A bird bath, I tell you. Why do you doubt it?" "Because I don't believe there's a burrd alive that can tell Saturday night from any other."

Sam Watkins, colored, was seeking a permit from a prohibition agent to buy wine. "What do you want it for?" asked the agent. "For sacreligious purposes, suh." "For sacreligious purposes?" You mean sacramental purposes." "Dat's it, suh. An' the committee has done appointed me tuh get it." "What kind of wine does your committee want?" "Well, suh, we talked it all over, and finally decided on gin."

"Snowball" Jackson had just returned from a trip. "Ah tell you, boys, it sho' am nice to be back home, eatin' good home cookin'. My wife makes de bes' biscuit in de world." "She do! She do!" enthusiastically spoke up one of the group of darkies around him. "What's dat!" bellowed Snowball. "What you-all know 'bout my wife's biscuit?" "I don't mean she do!" quickly apologized his friend; "I mean do she!"

"Don't prolong and draw out your stories to such an extent," said the editor to the seedy-looking individual who supplied him with his thrillers. "Condense them somewhat when nearing the finish." So this is how the writer finished off his next story—and, incidentally, the villain: "The villain took a Scotch whisky, his hat, his departure, no notice of his pursuers, a revolver out of his hip pocket, and, lastly, his life."

For reasons of economy a certain dowager had to part with her faithful and efficient butler. She gave him a cordial reference to a prospective employer. A few days later she was annoyed to get a catechism of questions from this lady: "Was he courteous, gentlemanly, honest, and of distinguished appearance?" To which she replied: "The Dowager Lady Blank wishes to say that if her butler owned half the virtues enumerated she would have married him herself years ago."

Representative Caraway of Arkansas said of a man who had failed: "He was doomed to fail. His life has been, in fact, nothing but a series of failures. "The first chapter of this series began in an insurance office where he obtained his first job, that of office boy. He had only just begun on this job when his boss looked up from an important letter one morning and said irritably: 'Don't whistle at your work, boy.' 'I aint workin', sir,' he answered; 'I'm only just whistlin'."

Just before the big show started the lion tamer and the dog trainer were seated in the dressing tent conversing about their respective acts. "How's that new dog you bought last month coming along?" inquired the lion tamer. "He's learning fast, and will make a good performer if I can ever get him accustomed to this jumping from town to town," replied the other. "It's going to be some job, though. Why, the day we showed in Kansas City he buried a bone beside the centre pole, and he tried to dig it up in Topeka the next day."

The parish priest had dropped in to see one of his flock, and, to prove his kindly interest in the family and all its members, he began to ask one of the little colleens how she was progressing at school. The usual questions as to the spelling of the interesting word "cat," and so forth, were put and answered. Then the priest turned to a more abstruse subject, geography. "Now, tell me, dear, what is a lake?" he asked. The little maid puckered her brows in thought for a moment. Then she said: "Plaze, yer rivrince, it's a kettle wid a hole in it."

It was a few hours after the operation for appendicitis in the Naval Hospital at Charleston, South Carolina. The nurse was sitting by his bed and the doctor had come by to see how he was getting along. Some of the yard force were burning trash in the yard just beyond his window, and the fire was very bright. He showed no signs of waking up. The doctor said to the nurse: "Miss Mary, will you please lower the shade? The patient is waking." "But, doctor," said the nurse, "the sunshine will do him good." "I know that, but if he wakes up and sees that fire out there he will think the operation was not successful."

One morning a negro sauntered into the office of a white friend. "Good-mawnin', Mr. Withrow. Kin I use yo' phone a minute?" he asked. "Why, certainly, Sam." Sam called his number, and after a few minutes' wait, said: "Is this Mrs. Whiteside? Well, I seen in de papeh where you-all wanted a good cullud man. Is you still wantin' one? Then the man youse got is puctfully satisfactory, and you doesn't conneplate makin' no change soon? All right, ma'am. Good-by." Mr. Withrow called to Sam as he left the phone, "Now that's too bad, Sam, that the place is filled." "Oh, dat's all right, Mr. Withrow, I'se de nigger what's got de job, but I'se jest a-wantin' to check up."

Pat Rooney had just opened a new home brew foundry, and as it was a rainy day there were quite a number of Pat's friends in the place seeking shelter from the storm. An Englishman was standing at the bar with a worried look on his face, which an Irishman named Mike noticed. Mike asked him what the trouble was. "This beer is awful," said the Englishman, "but I wouldn't dare let it stand for fear Pat would be insulted." "You're right," said Mike, sympathetically, "but I have a scheme. That fellow next to you has a raincoat on. Pour it into his pocket." "But," said the Englishman, "he is liable to catch me in the act." "Not a chance in the world," said Mike, with a chuckle. "I just poured mine into your pocket."

When the English tongue we speak
Why "break" is not rhymed with "break"?
Will you tell me why it's true
We saw "saw" but likewise "few";
And the fashioner of verse
Can not cap his "horse" with "worse"?
"Beard" sounds not the same as "heard";
"Cord" is different from "word";
"Cow" is cow, but "low" is low;
"Shoe" is never rhymed with "foe."
Think of "hose," and "dose," and "lose";
And of "goose," and also "choose."
Think of "comb," and "tomb," and "bomb";
"Doll," and "roll," and "home," and "some";
And since "pay" is rhymed with "say,"
Why not "paid" with "said," I pray?
We have "blood," and "food," and "good,"
"Mould" is not pronounced like "could."
Wherefore "done," but "gone," and "lone"?
Is there any reason known, --The Arrow.

Madrid.

According to some recent travelers, Madrid is one of the busiest and most progressive cities of southern Europe and the sleepy old world spot of former days is no longer recognizable. The principal avenues are filled with new and most ambitious-looking banks, while as many skyscrapers show against the horizon there as in Berlin, and everywhere are signs of building activities and the installation of the latest civic improvements. A recent addition to the number of splendid art galleries which the Spanish capital possesses is the Institute de Valencia de Don Juan, a private collection which resembles the Wallace and Soane collections of London and in lesser degree the fine aggregation of canvases and curios presented by the late Henry C. Frick to New York City. This institute is on Calle de Fortuny, and besides some excellent canvases of Spanish masters in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, it has the most complete assortment of old pottery known to exist, some of the Hispano-Moresque sort, absolutely unique and priceless. There are also large assortments of early furniture, tapestries, rugs, silver, and gold work and every example of the early crafts of Spain. The extensive collection of souvenirs, medals, and pictures belonging to the late Eugénie, former Empress of France, is the property of this new institute. The complete regalia of the Gold Fleece, the only known outside of Vienna, was in the possession of Eugénie.

The London Morning Post finds that the general belief in the unbusinesslike temper of artists is a quite mistaken one, and declares that the bankruptcy courts of the British Isles could give testimony that unbusinesslike business men are more numerous there than unbusinesslike artists. It calls attention to the willingness of artists at the present day to associate themselves with honorable business, holding exhibitions in bonnet shops and tailoring establishments. In Paris the young men are showing their work in cafés, and in London a young artist and his wife from Glasgow have started a modest tea shop with the artist's own pictures decorating the walls and staircase and, of course, for sale.

Produced Under the New HEXEON Process

ADDING A NEW CHAPTER TO THE BOOK OF ACHIEVEMENT

How We Overcame the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

Cycol will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of Cycol as shown on the Cycol Recommendation Chart. Use Associated gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

In a Paris gallery dedicated to antique furniture an attempt has recently been made to show modern pictures with the idea of proving the possibility of thus gaining a homogeneous effect. One of the French critics, admitting that this often has been successfully accomplished by amateurs, adds that it is wholly a question of choosing the right kind of modern picture and establishing a relationship between the work of the old designers and artisans and the modern artist represented. Certain moderns belong to precisely the same artistic family as certain old masters of decoration.

A curious complication has arisen in France over the right of a museum to exhibit a portrait that has been acquired by legacy. Count Potocki left to the Bonnat Museum at Bayonne, which holds many of the artist's works, a portrait that Bonnat had made of the Countess Potocki. But the latter objected to having her portrait publicly displayed in the museum and brought the questions before the courts. She has obtained from the judge the right to keep the portrait in seclusion while awaiting the ultimate decision.

"And might I ask what your business is?" asked the educator. "Certainly," answered the other. ### The Last Bit of London Bridge.

The builders of the new giant office block on the edge of the river at London Bridge allowed people the other morning to take a final glimpse of the arch of old London Bridge, found when the foundations were being dug (says the Manchester Guardian). For a century or so this noble piece of masonry, all unknown, had been holding up the yellow-faced Pearl Insurance office, now destroyed. Preservation of the relic was impossible, so, like the remains of the Roman camp at Manchester, the ancient arch must be brought to light only to disappear forever.

Clerks from warehouses round and a few determined women sightseers were scrambling down ladders into the clayey pit where, in the vague light, the powerful span of the arch swept over their heads. It was all wonderfully fresh and eloquent. Marks of use could be traced on the silvery stone. One might pass one's hand over the ivory surface of the arch and follow the wear of the tides of many centuries—of more than seven centuries, if this is indeed part of the original bridge of Peter of Colechurch. The water has carved the soft stone into curves, as you might scoop out a cheese with a knife. This was the most eloquent thing to be seen.

The work of the early eighteenth-century could be studied in the three moulded ribs of Portland stone put under the old bridge at that period to strengthen it, and the spring of the arch of the additions which in 1759 widened the bridge was revealed also. An old mooring ring still in place was the only human touch—oddly enough, no interesting relics were found in the old slime.

It was interesting, if only for a minute, to inspect this fossil of old London, dug out of its mediæval bed while the crowd of lunch-hour office youths looked down rather jeeringly from the parapet of new London Bridge. These were the very stones that upheld those rows of sharp-toothed houses built along the mediæval bridge which made of it the river heart of old London.

Short-Haired Women.

Russia has become a nation of short-haired women. This to the newcomer is supposed to be a symptom of Communist leanings, in a country where the men formerly advertised their faith in the Soviet brand of politics by wearing long hair, heavy beards, leather coats, and top boots. As a matter of fact, the majority of short-haired women are not Communists at all. They earned their short hair by surviving the typhus. Typhus is as common in Russia as mumps in the United States. Those who contract it, men or women, have their heads shaved.

The U. C. Board of Regents.

There are three vacancies in the Board of Regents of the State University—one due to the death of Mr. Taussig, two to expiration of the fixed terms to which the incumbents—Mrs. Sartori of Los Angeles and Mr. P. E. Bowles of San Francisco—were appointed. Mrs. Sartori came into the board under appointment to fill the unexpired term of the late Mrs. Phoebe Hearst. Her service therefore has covered only the past two years. In that period Mrs. Sartori has demonstrated her qualifications by intelligence, industry, and enthusiasm. She ought to be reappointed. Mr. Bowles came into the board some fourteen years ago to fill an unexpired term. He took up the work with interest and energy and in the succeeding years has been diligent in it. No other member of the board has met its responsibilities in more definite spirit of devotion or with closer attention to its details. His enthusiasm as a botanist, his interest in library development, his skill in finance, his practical common sense in relation to the general interests of the university have all been exercised unremittingly. Mr. Bowles' retirement from the board would be a distinct loss to the university. His continuation in it would be nothing more than a proper recognition of his services. We hear clamorous echoes of various class demands for direct representation in the Board of Regents. Governor Stephens, we trust, will not be influenced by them to give special recognition to any particular "interest," much less to deny to either Mrs. Sartori or

Mr. Bowles the compliment their service merits. The university is no place for the "bloc" principle in administration. It is open to all upon equal terms and its administration has thus far avoided the experience of clashing interests that have damaged the standing of other and similar institutions.

A Colossal Moral Blunder.

The soldier bonus bill, so its advocates insist, is only the carrying out of a pledge made by the Republican party at its national convention of 1920. They have said this so often that no doubt they have come to believe it. Let us consult the record. The platform plank which is construed as a "pledge" is as follows:

We hold in imperishable remembrance the valor and the patriotism of the soldiers and sailors of America who fought in the great war for human liberty, and we pledge ourselves to discharge to the fullest the obligations which a grateful nation justly should fulfill, in appreciation of the services rendered by its defenders on sea and on land.

Republicans are not ungrateful. Throughout their history they have shown their gratitude toward the nation's defenders. Liberal legislation for the care of the disabled and infirm and their dependents has ever marked Republican policy toward the soldier and sailor of all the wars in which our country has participated. The present Congress has appropriated generously for the disabled of the world war.

The amounts already applied and authorized for the fiscal year 1920-21 for this purpose reached the stupendous sum of $1,180,571,893. This legislation is significant of the party's purpose in generously caring for the maimed and disabled men of the recent war.

Concurrently the convention, dealing with the subject of taxation, spoke of the burden as "staggering," declaring further that sound policy * * * demands the early accomplishment of that real reduction of the tax burden which may be achieved by substituting simple for complex tax laws and procedure; prompt and certain determination for the tax liability for delay and uncertainty; tax laws which do not, for tax laws which do, excessively mulct the consumer or needlessly repress enterprise and thrift.

These expressions must be taken together. Their construction into a promise to provide a general bonus for ex-service men is not merely strained, but absolutely unwarranted. Under this interpretation the party is held to a pledge which in truth it did not make either directly or by implication. In plain logic the tax plank forbids extravagance in the sphere of national finance. President Harding's position that our essential obligation is to the disabled is not only in accord with the platform, but the complete fulfillment of its assurances. The government is giving attention to the disabled men, caring for them in hospitals, reeducating them in ways designed to make them efficient and self-supporting members of society, providing in special cases liberal cash allowances—and this is all that was promised.

Now let us see how the demand for the bonus originated: The American Legion came into being professedly as an instrument of national service through which the men who had made sacrifices as members of the armies of the United States in time of war were to approach the tasks and responsibilities of citizenship in time of peace in similar patriotic spirit. But just as the American Legion, following the St. Louis convention, began to assume large proportions several rival organizations of ex-service men came into existence. There was the Private Soldiers' and Sailors' League, with membership limited to enlisted men, formed frankly and openly for the purpose of securing a bonus with other financial assistance from the government. Here and there throughout the country demagogues busied themselves in efforts to bring selfish elements among the ex-service men into organizations in which war service was to be commercialized to political and other ends. At about this time many of the local chapters and even some of the state organizations of the Legion went on record in opposition to the principle of the cash bonus. Immediately growth in membership of the Legion was checked. The next step was suppression of anti-bonus sentiment in the Legion, and presently that organization was found standing for the bonus, with the effect of rapidly increasing its membership.

Many members and promoters of the Legion as originally formed deliberately compromised their convictions in respect to the bonus in order to obtain what they conceived to be a larger good, namely, the gathering together of as many service men as could be brought into it in order to prevent their drifting into radical organizations promoted by self-seeking demagogues. Here is all that there is of defense for the Legion in its present attitude. It is, of course, a defense that does not justify present demands; it merely points to an error of judgment on the part of those who did not foresee the lengths to which organized selfishness could go. Can it be doubted that the Legion, by permitting its bonus-seeking element to overwhelm it, has lost the capacity for service and citizenship that was in the minds of its earlier promoters?

There is a broad field for the cynic, the satirist, even for the humorist, in the situation at Washington, where Congress is snarled up in relation to two pestiferous questions: (1) the bonus; (2) the methods of raising money to meet it. It is a situation that does not speak for the political acumen of the make-up of Congress. Politicians of the past have usually been adroit enough to present a plausible appearance of virtue—of regard for the public—but here, in a panic over the coming election, all masks are off and the politicians stand forth in naked selfishness and pettiness. They are supporting the bonus, not because they believe it is right, not because the country is in a position to pay it, but because they deem it to be essential to their reelection this coming November.

Some nine months or more ago President Harding pointed out to Congress that the condition of the public treasury was not such as to justify the granting of a cash bonus. Here was his opportunity to kill the whole business by a straight-from-the-shoulder presentation of the matter in its moral logic. He missed the chance of a great service by limiting his presentation to the financial phase of the matter. More recently, when the situation became tense under the demand of congressmen for their own reelection benefits, a party council was assembled at the White House. It was made up of the chairman of the national committee and of various Republicans of both Senate and House. Immediately following, announcement was made that the bonus bill had become part of the party's legislative programme for this season. It is apparent that the council had overridden the judgment of the President and had determined that the bonus was necessary in order that the party might continue in control of the legislative branch. But the President would not go all the way; he stuck to his ground that if Congress shall write into law a cash bonus bill it must provide concurrently a method for raising the necessary revenue to cover the new obligation.

This is the situation today. In the meantime the congressional leaders who brought it about are beginning to fear that their judgment was wrong, because from all parts of the country there is pouring into Washington a flood of protests against the bonus and against the imposition of new taxes. The Republicans are not worrying alone, since the Democrats fully share their agitation. The latter see the Republicans getting into a hole and they can see no way to avoid getting into the same hole themselves. There is a veritable panic on Capitol Hill.

There is nothing more difficult than for those who have directly or by implication done a half-wrong to turn about and set themselves right. There is a way to do it in the present emergency, but it is a way that calls for a kind of courage rarely found in those with whom politics rather than statesmanship is a profession. Having waded in and found the water deep, the Republicans at Washington ought now to face about and wade out. Admitted that return to the solid ground of sound principle and sound finance would be difficult, it is none the less to be borne in mind that danger lies ahead. Truly, it has been said that if Congress shall disregard the public will by enacting this bonus bill the people will rise in their wrath and smash Congress.

In the bringing about of the situation as it stands President Harding is not without fault. He missed his chance when he made naught of the principle involved in the bonus and made much of the expediences connected with it. None the less he is nearer right than anybody else involved in the present mix-up. It would, obviously, now be an embarrassment for him to get himself wholly right. But he is the one man able by his individual authority and the prestige of his office to call a halt upon a ruinous programme—ruinous less in its immediate demands than in its ultimate consequences. He ought to do it.

Diplomatic Contrasts.

The silences of a talkative man are always impressive. Lloyd George's normal aspect, however deceptive it may be, is one of frank communicativeness. When therefore he received in profound silence M. Poincaré's stern protest on the reparations issue and the Genoa Conference a week or two ago, his attitude proved very disconcerting to the French premier, who doubtless felt that the Welshman had stolen his thunder—or rather, his quietude. It seemed rather unjust that M. Poincaré, whose greatest accomplishment is silence, should be forced into such an unbecoming extreme of articulateness, while his opponent, who usually talks whenever possible, wraps himself God-like in a taciturn cloud.

This may seem a trifle, but it is not. It shows that there is something unsound in the tradition of silent diplomacy. The accent, at least, appears to have been misplaced. A talkative diplomat not only surrounds himself with a reassuring aura of candor, but when he chooses to remain silent, he creates an atmosphere of awe. The habitually silent negotiator, on the other hand, remains a subject of anxious conjecture until he declares himself, and then he can hardly fail to disappoint the expectation with which the world has surveyed his alabaster countenance. As an instance, one need only mention Colonel House. For a considerable time the Colonel, by the simple expedient of holding his tongue, worried Europe into thinking him the intellectual colossus of America. But when, at the entreaty of the press syndicates, the Colonel finally consented to interpret the mysteries of international politics to the American public, the result was distressing, not because his observations were unenlightening, but because they could not possibly justify the reputation for profundity with which his silence had invested him. "There are a sort of men," says Gratiano in the play, "who do a wilful stillness entertain, with purpose to be dressed in an opinion of wisdom, gravity, profound conceit; as who should say, 'I am Sir Oracle, and when I ope my lips let no dog bark.' Men that therefore only are reputed wise for saying nothing." This need not be applied in its entirety to Colonel House. But its interest with regard to Lloyd George is that the very dogs stop barking when his lips are shut.

Until the Latin countries produce a statesman who can equal this Welshman in dramatic acumen, he will continue to dominate European diplomacy. He possesses the arts of Briand and Poincaré rolled into one, with a whimsical something added. But one imagines that in the sincere and artless part of him he has a great deal in common with Briand. The reports of the Cannes Conference suggested a more than official cordiality between the two, and it may be that Lloyd George had some thought of avenging the fall of his colleague and the dislocation of their plans by showing up the pretensions of the new premier. If this was his object, it was eminently successful. Nothing more than a few days' silence was needed to throw consternation into the Poincaré camp and arouse the opposition to a chorus of "You promised that you would make Lloyd George do what you wanted, but where are you getting? Perhaps Briand's way was the best after all."

Until this week none of the measures undertaken by

M. Poincaré when he assumed office had advanced a step. Even the Treaty of Alliance hung fire, evidently because it was being held as the price of French acquiescence in England's attitude toward Russia and Germany and in the English view of reparations. Whether Saturday's meeting between the premiers improved M. Poincaré's position remains to be shown. France's weapons are the threat of a Ruhr invasion, and refusal to participate in any scheme of reconstruction until her demands are met, but these are desperate and two-edged expedients, and she hardly dares employ them.

There is, in brief, a game called poker, and in it a manoeuvre called "bluff." M. Poincaré's appears to have been called.

A Movement for Promotion of Admiral Sims.

Mr. Hearst's Examiner tries to make scandal out of the fact that a multitude of American citizens, in appreciation of his distinguished and patriotic record, are desirous that Admiral Sims shall be given a substantial promotion before his retirement from active service some time this year. The editor of the Argonaut, among others, is quoted as approving a movement, if it may be so called, looking to the bestowal of the rank of Admiral upon the man who held that temporary rank during the war and who employed its authority with tact, skill, and success. The editor of the Argonaut admits the fact. He is proud to be enrolled among those who wish to see an honorable figure given a reward that will illustrate American appreciation of honorable service. Of course, Mr. Hearst stands opposed to any project calculated to emphasize or reward anybody who helped win the war; and this course accords perfectly with the attitude of criticism and obstruction that he sustained while the war was in progress. Along with others whose activities tended, in so far as they were heeded, to embarrass the efforts of the government and to make things easy for Germany, Mr. Hearst now would deny to distinguished merit honors it has fairly earned.

It was given to Admiral Sims to command the American naval forces sent into European waters to co-operate with the Allied fleets. A small man, a vain man, a contentious man, so commissioned, would have made himself, in his relations with our allies, a pest and a nuisance. Fortunately, we had in Admiral Sims a man of broad mind, of practical skill, of coöperative spirit. He had in hand a delicate duty and he so carried himself toward it as to make the most of our relatively small resources and to gain effective results. That he deserves well of his country all men of judgment and of patriotic feeling gladly admit. Just as General Pershing symbolizes our success in the fields of France, so Admiral Sims symbolizes our success in the naval phase of the war. He was content to serve. He asks for no reward. But his admirers would be glad if he might be given recognition in a form that would be to him personally a benefit, and that in its suggestion would be a stimulant to the arm to which he is attached and an inspiration to patriotism. If there be any scandal in open efforts to this end, Mr. Hearst is privileged to make the most of it.

The Treaties in the Senate.

Friends and critics alike of Senator Johnson regret the position he has taken in the matter of the Conference treaties. He has, of course, the right—indeed it would be his duty—to oppose confirmation in obedience to a sense of conviction. But unfortunately the impression prevails that Mr. Johnson's course stands related to political or other calculations and that it has scant foundation, or none at all, in devotion to principle. It is unfortunate for Mr. Johnson's repute that he has not established himself with the public—even with many who admire his gifts—as one whose sayings and doings are founded upon moral conviction. The reflection is general, if not unanimous, that in his love of conflict, his propensity to detraction, his association with radical elements, rather than a sense of duty, lie the inspiration of his assault upon the treaties. That the objections urged by Mr. Johnson and his associated group of chronic objectors will defeat confirmation is not believed. The treaties represent the judgment of statesmen of highest intelligence and of undoubted patriotic spirit. They have the approval of President Harding. Public opinion demands their confirmation. So supported, there seems little doubt that favorable action on the part of the Senate will be prompt and decisive. Assuredly it should be so. Defeat of the treaties would be a national discredit, not more in its immediate effects than in what it would imply relative to American diplomacy. We can not afford to stand before the world as a nation whose councils are so contentious and divided as to render our government impotent in its relation to world affairs. Surely Mr. Johnson, Mr. Borah, and Mr. Reed and their associate irreconcilables must know this, and as surely they ought not to stand upon quibbles and trivialities respecting the great matters under consideration.

The Voice of Common Sense.

An intensely practical man, a man whose mind works honestly and definitely, a man with no vice of timidity, is Mr. Charles M. Schwab. Perhaps no one in the country is better placed through knowledge of men and things to visualize our national problems clearly or to define them with higher moral authority. What Mr. Schwab said at a meeting of the Ohio Society of New York last month (printed in another column) is worth serious attention. Mr. Schwab accurately appraises the situation in the declaration that if we are to have an outburst of industrial prosperity we must establish facilities in the field of transportation for taking care of enlarged activities. He is right in the further declaration that our commerce can not go forward confidently unless our railroads are put in position to carry the transportation of the country, made able to attract the capital needed for their rehabilitation and extension—essential, if they are to perform their service as common carriers.

Mr. Schwab does not seek to minimize the evils of the past, but he insists that by-gones shall be by-gones, and that the present need is for an unprejudiced and practical attitude of the public mind toward the railroads in their present conditions and as looking to the future. He has studied the situation and he finds the railroads of the country today in honest and capable hands, competent, if allowance shall be given them, to re-create for the public service a system of transportation adequate to the common welfare.

Mr. Schwab might have gone further to speak in similar spirit of our ocean transport service. At a dozen points its development is restricted. American shipping men may not, like their rivals of other countries, regulate their activities by world standards. They can not do business upon business principles because the laws of their country will not permit it. It is for this reason that our merchant marine is crippled and all but impotent. Again, it is for this reason that our leading men of maritime enterprise—Captain Robert Dollar locally notable—find it necessary to seek the privileges and the protection of foreign flags. Here is a field in which common sense needs to be exercised; and until its privileges shall be restored we shall have no merchant marine worthy of the name. A bounty system, such as is now proposed, may yield a measure of artificial relief. But it will be relatively of small utility. What is needed is to unbind the hands of our men of enterprise, to give them leave to compete unrestricted on the world's great highways.

Stumbling Toward Perfection.

The gravity of the Roma disaster can not be minimized. In the face of a catastrophe so distressing there can be no even-handed weighing of advantage against loss. But surely no one believes that this calamity will forestall or even hinder the future development of the dirigible. Much less is there reason for saying, as many people did under the shock of the first reports, that lighter-than-air craft should be abolished. This implies that they can be.

Such a contention shows an almost complete miscomprehension of human nature. As yet no horror or catastrophe has ever daunted the experimental impulse in humankind. The heavy mortality in the early days of plane flying stimulated rather than hindered the development of that invention. More general interest was centered on it; more minds set themselves to the task of obviating the imperfections which each new accident revealed. Moreover, the increased sense of danger attracted into aviation a great number of adventurers who would otherwise have preferred scaling Himalayas or photographing volcanoes. The fate of Locklear did not lessen the daring of Jenkins in stunt flying; the tragedy of Jenkins will not discourage others from flirting with death in a parachute. And the collapse of the R-38 in Hull last summer did not lessen the demand for passenger space in the Roma.

This tendency is not to be deplored or regretted, in itself. Certainly it can not be abolished. The deplorable feature of the recent aeronautical accidents is their superfluity. At this date it seems an exasperating commentary upon human intelligence that any aviator need use a defective parachute—that its operation can not be made as accurate as, for example, the opening of a watch case, or that a rudder, an instrument with which we have had long experience in cruising the seas, should be the most defective detail in a ship with which we propose to navigate the air.

But all this is part of a stumbling toward perfection which seems to be the law of human progress. It would seem to be necessary to commit every error before its corresponding weakness can be eliminated, and to suffer every consequence of mistaken method before the right one can be found. And when, by this blundering procedure, one mechanism has been perfected, that indomitable pigmy, man, will set about perfecting by the same degrees other more perilous and sublime contrivances. Does any one seriously hope to arrest the process? Before such a result can be achieved, the inventive impulse of the race will have to be extinct, and this can only mean that the race itself will be no more.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

"Praise from Sir Hubert Is Praise Indeed."

GENERAL OFFICE THE ASSOCIATED PRESS.

NEW YORK CITY, February 14, 1922.

ALFRED HOLMAN, ESQ.—My Dear Holman: I have just seen a copy of the Argonaut of February 4th. * * * The Argonaut seems to me even more interesting than it was in the old days of Frank Pixley, and that is certainly saying a good deal. I trust you are doing as well as you deserve, which is also saying a good deal. With all good wishes,

A Word of Cheer from New Orleans.

NEW ORLEANS, February 18, 1922.

MR. ALFRED HOLMAN—Dear Sir: I congratulate you upon your article entitled "Politics and the Bonus" appearing in the Argonaut of February 11th. Honesty and fearlessness are traits to be commended wherever found. Evidently you place principle above party. Best wishes and hope that you will continue to educate the people as to what the bonus really means.

From an Advocate of the Bonus.

DUNSMUIR, CAL., February 26, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: Until a few weeks ago I was a proud reader of your paper, but since I find that you have taken such a stand in regard to the soldier bonus I feel very different about the Argonaut. Taking Mr. Gerstle's letter, for example. We can not place him in the same position as the average soldier or ex-service man. He left a profession—a business, I presume, which in his absence would continue to accumulate wealth. Possibly not in the same proportions as if he personally conducted his affairs, but when he returned he had something to step into.

What did the average service man return to? After serving in the war he had no work to come back to and found it impossible to get any. It is true the service men performed a "citizen's duty," but what about the man who stayed at home on work of national importance? Did they earn the trifling wage that the soldier earned? Were they in the same dangers? No. They earned big money, far in excess of what they were entitled and benefited greatly by the war—and the man who gave all to serve, either by his own free will or by the will of his country?

Eager to serve for the cause of humanity, I joined the American Legion a year before America declared war. When the war ended I was liberally rewarded by a grateful nation for the small service I rendered. Those who stayed at home earned big money and were able to get all kinds of work and keep up to date, while the soldier staked his life for his country and when he returned he found he wasn't wanted and that there was no work. No gratuity is too big a compensation for such a service rendered and payment should have been arranged for a year ago.

THE LEGION AND THE BONUS.

A Protest and President MacNider's Reply to It

SAN FRANCISCO, February 15, 1922.

Hanford MacNider,
Meridian Life Building,
Indianapolis, Indiana—

Many Legion members in California are unalterably opposed to the adjusted compensation measure and ask me as one of their number to solicit at your hands a referendum vote of all members. Many who voted for the bonus desire now to vote against it. For the good of our great organization I venture to urge that this be done. Please answer collect, 633 Market Street, San Francisco.

WILLIAM C. VAN ANTWERP.

TELEGRAM FROM MACNIDER TO VAN ANTWERP.

MASON CITY, February 18, 1922.

William C. Van Antwerp,
633 Market Street,
San Francisco, California—

This is matter for your department commander to settle. If considerable number of Legion men in California opposed to adjusted compensation you are practically alone in the nation. Negligible minority ex-service men opposed found in nearly every case traceable to financial interests fighting the bill on account of taxation. There is no such demand as yours nationally. The Legion has unanimously endorsed this bill in national convention. I am instructed and intend to carry out their programme to the best of my ability. As a Legion member, believe your duty to abide by will of the majority if you want to speak as Legion man. As ex-service man outside of organization you are of course free to do as you please.

MACNIDER.

LETTER FROM VAN ANTWERP TO MACNIDER.

633 MARKET STREET,
SAN FRANCISCO, February 23, 1922.

Hanford MacNider, Esquire,
National Commander American Legion,
Meridian Life Building,
Indianapolis, Indiana—

MY DEAR MACNIDER: I have your telegram of the 18th instant in reply to mine of the 15th instant.

It is a discouraging and a disheartening message.

I pass over without comment your failure to answer my question regarding a referendum on the part of our membership, your insinuation that "financial interests" are behind those ex-service men who oppose the bonus, and your suggestion that I must abide by the will of the majority or resign. A telegram is an unsatisfactory medium and I know you to be incapable of rudeness. You were elected and instructed on a bonus platform, and having accepted that mandate you must see it through. The Legion could not have selected a better man, nor, I am bound to add, a more unworthy cause. But let that pass.

You and I volunteered for service under a vitalizing spiritual impulse. When we got home we joined the American Legion because, shocked and disillusion by the war and its aftermath, we found in it a hope and an ideal. Let us read over again the preamble of our constitution:

"For God and country, we associate ourselves together for the following purposes: To uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States of America; to maintain law and order; to foster and perpetuate a one hundred per cent. Americanism; to preserve the memories and incidents of our association in the great war; to inculcate a sense of individual obligation to the community, state, and nation; to combat the autocracy of both the classes and the masses; to make right the master of might; to promote peace and good will on earth; to safeguard and transmit to posterity the principles of justice, freedom, and democracy; to consecrate and sanctify our comradeship by our devotion to mutual helpfulness."

The preamble recited above says nothing about a bonus and I can not believe that any such mercenary thought influenced its authors. Yet for more than a year the bonus has been the principal concern of the Legion; for more than a year its lobby has been at work in Congress, and for more than a year its membership has steadily and rapidly declined. In a measure at least, cause and effect are here clearly defined.

You term this claim "adjusted compensation" because, as you put it, those who stayed at home made more money than those who went to war, and you propose to adjust this difference. Now in the first place it is not true that all industrial workers who remained at work received more or even as much as those under arms, nor is it true that all who went to war would have made large profits had they remained at home. Nevertheless it is unfortunately true that through graft, corruption, strikes, or other improper causes a small group of workmen in shipyards and war munition factories were grossly overpaid, and this is the class at whose excessive pay the adjusted compensation measure is directed. Bear in mind that of the 36,000,000 workers in the United States less than 10 per cent. were parties to this wage grab. The teachers, salesmen, clerks, ministers, postal employees, farmers, stenographers, etc.—our best types—got none of it. The hold-up was confined to but few, and it was a downright scandal. But two wrongs do not make a right, and the Legion should be the last group in the world to seek an adjustment or parity with the grafters who all but betrayed them while they were in the trenches. Upon this ground many thoughtful Legion men base their opposition to the whole bonus programme.

Again, while the Legion and its lobby have been engaged on the bonus programme there has arisen on the part of the public a degree of suspicion and distrust that none of us ever expected. You and I daily encounter newspaper editorials, magazine articles, and public speeches containing most unflattering comment on our patriotism and our citizenship. This criticism is not alone directed against us, but against all ex-service men, although the large majority never joined the Legion. This increasing unpopularity threatens to undermine all our usefulness and to thwart the purposes for which we came together, not as bonus-seekers, but as high-minded citizens imbued with a determination to serve the commonwealth. It distresses me immeasurably to add that, if the Legion is determined to insist upon the bonus in defiance of its own principles, in defiance of public opinion, in defiance of the warnings of the treasury, and in defiance of rudimentary citizenship, its career as a real American Legion will end ingloriously.

Nay more, in addition to injuring ourselves, our insistence on a bonus is sure to injure those sick, wounded, and mentally afflicted veterans for whose maintenance the American people were prepared to make any sacrifice. I am certain that the public solicitude for these unfortunates will diminish, consciously or unconsciously, as the spectacle is presented of increasing demands by hale and hearty veterans who returned from the war unscathed. I say "increasing demands" because every one knows that the demands for bonuses will not stop here and that for a generation to come they will reappear under different guises and different names. The effect of all this upon the public sympathy for our deserving wounded men is bound to be felt.

It has been declared in the Senate that seventy-five billion dollars must be spent on our disabled veterans before our obligation is discharged. This will call for large annual appropriations throughout the next generation. How will the public look upon this proper and legitimate appropriation when there is added to it from year to year sordid and mercenary demands for bonuses, honorariums, or adjusted compensations. It seems to me to be inevitable that the disabled men who need all our care and attention will lose vastly more by the bonus agitation than its proponents will gain. Have they not lost enough, these wounded and sick?

The lesson of the war was sacrifice; the lesson of its aftermath is sacrifice. The duty of 1917-18 is the duty of today. The men who came back from the war unimpaired in mind and body have no more right to ask a gratuity for doing their duty and for making their sacrifices than have those of all ages and both sexes who fought the good fight at home. Again I deny the Legion's right to impair the future welfare of their less fortunate brothers in arms who came back sick and wounded. Again I deny their right, or any man's right, to ask a gratuity for the high privilege of defending his country. Again I deny the right to put me and my ex-service colleagues on the same plane of adjusted compensation with those slackers, for such they were, who forced from our harassed people extortionate wages when the country was fighting for its life. Upon these beliefs we ex-service men stand firm, and for these principles we shall fight to the end.

It may be as you say, my dear MacNider, that these are the views of only a "negligible minority" of the Legion. You may be right, but I can not believe it. At any rate they are the views of those "100 per cent. Americans" whom the Legion in its preamble sought to enlist, and must retain, if it is to endure.

With kindest personal regards, I am,

Very truly yours,

WILLIAM C. VAN ANTWERP.

The American Railroads.

Speaking at the annual dinner of the Ohio Society in New York, January 14th, Mr. Charles M. Schwab said:

Amid all the welter of world politics one can not help but see that the peoples of the world are day by day coming to a sounder understanding of their problems and a firmer determination to meet them with stout hearts and erect heads.

In this country we have many problems to be solved, but there is one particular point that I would like to make on this occasion, which it seems to me is fundamental to the restoration of American prosperity.

The greatest of American interests next to agriculture is that of transportation. I have been told that it would take five billion dollars to put our transportation companies abreast of the commercial requirements of the nation and to make up for their inability to expand and progress during the past few years. If we were to have an outburst of industrial prosperity, it is altogether unlikely that our railroads would be able to carry the burden.

Our railroads for the past two years have abandoned more miles of track than they have built, and in that period they have probably retired from service more freight and passenger cars than they have installed. In a country like ours, with its great future still ahead of it, that is an impossible situation.

We can not have prosperity, our country's commerce can not go forward confidently, unless our railroads are once again made prosperous, are put in position to carry the transportation of the country, and are able to attract the capital needed for them to perform their service as common carriers.

We have imposed upon our railroads a network of laws and restrictions which has made their rates no longer responsive to the changing commercial needs of the country, which has taken away from their managers the power to exercise initiative and enterprise, and which has made private capital unwilling to embark in railroad development except under most rigid guarantees.

I am a firm believer in the fact that the way to get results in life and in industry is to put your faith in men. When I went into the Emergency Fleet Corporation I did very little work myself, but the Emergency Fleet Corporation got great results because I spent my time making the men in charge of the job understand that I was behind them, giving them encouragement and confidence.

We should stop knocking our railroads, our railroad presidents, and railroad men in general. The railroads have had an awful drubbing, such as no other industry in the history of this nation has ever gone through.

There have been evils in the past, but the damage done in the restriction of enterprise and the prevention of progress, through the laws which have been passed, has been infinitely greater than all the material harm due to the financial scandals which were committed. We should, of course, prevent evil and scandal, but we must also be careful not to stifle progress.

But no matter what has taken place in the past, I am firmly of opinion that no finer and more conscientious lot of men was ever attempting to discharge their duties to the public under difficult conditions than the men who are today running the railroads of the United States.

Look about you, examine the names of the men who are today at the head of our railroads. Do you know a single one who does not deserve your implicit confidence? They are not speculators; they are not grafters; they are high-minded public servants deserving of public trust and of public enthusiasm.

Most of our railroad presidents started at the bottom of the ladder. Samuel Rea, president of the Pennsylvania Railroad, began as a rodman nearly fifty years ago. Daniel Willard of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad and Frederick Underwood of the Erie started as trainmen. Going through the list you will find that our railroad officers are today among the very best illustrations of what American boys can do with opportunity and ambition. There isn't a man today at the head of an American railroad who is not a credit to the industry with which he is connected and an asset to his country.

The American people are today boss of the railroads. Let us honor these men, help them in the solution of their difficulties, and make them feel that we are with them for progress and prosperity. Let us back our railroad officers as the manager of a great industry would get behind his department heads.

At every turn our railroad managers are hemmed in by rules, regulations, and restrictions which deprive them of power to exercise their discretion, prevent the exercise of the sound business judgment which has grown out of their long experience, and interfere with their doing acts which if done would contribute immeasurably to the restoration of prosperity.

Oftentimes the wisdom, judgment, and experience of an able and conscientious railroad executive is set at naught by the caprice of a railroad commissioner with no business experience whatever.

You never make progress by hamstringing ability and initiative, and no industry ever gave good service long if it wasn't prosperous itself.

My message, therefore, to the American people is that as a measure to contribute to the revival of prosperity in our country, let us repeal all the laws we have placed on the statute books which repress initiative, restrict enterprise, and dampen enthusiasm on the part of the men in charge of our railroads.

Let us make our railroad presidents feel that we regard them as honored public servants, and let us make every man engaged in the railroad business feel that the public is behind him and wants him and his company to be successful and prosperous.

Protect the public interest in every way that is necessary; maintain such regulation of railroads as actual experience shows to be justified, but abandon all the regulation which is based merely upon political motive and popular prejudice.

If we make our railroad regulations non-political, restore to our railroad managers the power to exercise ability and initiative, and make them feel that the public is behind them with all its force and energy, the miracles that will be wrought in the promotion of prosperity will astonish the world.

We need a new era in dealing with our railroads; and it is bound to come. I am a believer in American railroads and in the men who run them, and I propose as a measure of promoting the revival of prosperity in this great land of ours to do everything in my power to have these men receive that public support which they are entitled to enjoy.

With the object of keeping the Baltic open during the winter in the interests of trade, the Soviet government has acquired the ice-breaker Sviatogor from the British admiralty. The vessel is at present in the Firth of Forth, where she is being reconditioned. Resembling a battleship in appearance, she is the best-equipped ice-breaker afloat. She is capable of seven knots per hour through thick ice. In the Baltic she will work in conjunction with two other vessels of the same type.

TWO PRIME MINISTERS.

Briand represents a type of man with whom one would like to become better acquainted. To the average American he has never been much more than a name, though the name was always favorably impressive. It sounded like brigand and had a suggestion of fire; it might have been the name of one who burned bridges on a generous and lusty scale, with gallantry, wholeheartedness, courage, and perhaps an occasional touch of mischievous humor. There is difficulty in dissociating names from our first impressions on hearing them, but it is the present writer's superstition that on the strength of a name he prefigured Briand as something of this sort, before learning much more about him. At any rate the picture is one that time tends to embellish and amplify without changing the strong essentials. Each new disclosure of the ex-premier's character confirms his initial claim to admiration and respect.

The latest earnest of his courage is the report, on the authority of Cunliffe-Owen, that he favors the reduction of the French war debt to America by selling us the possessions of France in the Caribbean Sea and her colony at Guiana, with the broader purpose of strengthening the confidence of this country in French protestations of friendship. Certainly no diplomatic measure could more readily or completely achieve its object. Something of the sort has long been advocated by the former American minister, Charles H. Sherrill, who hopes to see the Caribbean transformed into a Pan-American lake, and the threat of foreign control of the entrance to the Mississippi and the Panama Canal thereby removed. To this end, he has even advocated the purchase of all the West Indian possessions of Holland, France, and Great Britain.

A passing reference to this subject occurs in Sherrill's recent book, "Prime Ministers and Presidents," issued by the Doran Company. But the consummation, as far as France at least is concerned, is considered by Sherrill to be entirely remote. The usurpation of the executive function by the legislative in France has made the premier the logical and necessary sponsor for such a measure, but no prime minister would dare propose it. He would inevitably, says Sherrill, be voted down in the Chamber of Deputies, whose members are not prepared to look so far ahead, and whom no premier could hope to lead up to such a policy through mature deliberation, owing to the insecurity of his tenure of office.

Briand, however, is essentially a man who returns to an unsuccessful charge undaunted, and if he entertains the purpose with which he is credited we shall hear of it again. The risk of defeat in the chamber, grave though it was, did not prevent him from carrying through his plan of having Germany work out part of her money payments by providing German-made materials for use in French reconstruction. This plan, the details of which were negotiated by Loucheur, one of the largest business men in France, and Rathenau, the German "Electrical King," was a victory of political sagacity over the small-change attitude of Poincaré and his pursy train of what they used to call in Montmartre "marchandes de frites." It not only speeded up the work of reconstruction, but allayed much of the acerbity that had been aroused by France's continued occupation of the Ruhr district, and put skids under the militaristic faction at a time when they contemplated a disastrous sally.

Of this phase of his endeavor the Briand who shot across our firmament with such meteoric suddenness during the Peace Conference hardly offered a hint, and his fall from office on his return to France followed so close upon, that he vanished from sight at the very moment when American interest in him was keenest. One caught a fleeting glimpse of leonine hair, streaked with gray, Viking moustaches, a broad, full forehead betokening tolerance and large-mindedness, deep-carved facial lines that looked like scars of combat, and penetrating, far-seeing eyes of intense blue, with a glint of the humor or sympathy that is never quite absent from the gaze of those who have lived in close contact with the mass of their fellow-creatures. In his intimate study of the French premier Mr. Sherrill allows us to complete the picture. He attaches importance to the fact that Briand is a fisherman, as an indication that he adds the rarer quality of patience to the quick perception and clear reason so characteristic of his race. He has had the faith and determination to move such mountains of convention as Lord Curzon from the British Foreign Office to Paris, when that ponderous dignitary insisted on his coming to London as a mark of deference. He is ready to dare any odds for the vindication of a friend, as in the famous dispute in the Chamber over the antedated telegram. And he allows no interest or affiliation to interfere with what he conceives to be for the welfare of France, as was proven when as Socialist prime minister in 1910 he defeated the Socialist railway strike by summoning the strikers to military duty and assigning them to service on the railways they planned to desert. During the dispute over the Upper Silesia problem he refused to meet the clamor of his countrymen for the occupation of the Ruhr district when that move would have proved immensely popular and would have greatly consolidated his power at home. He resisted this pressure, as he braved many another, because he sees beyond the boundaries of France in matters political and is free from the opportunism that gains present advantage at the loss of future standing in the comity of the world. In the courage with which he has contended, indifferent to calumny, for a sane and magnanimous statecraft he resembles Lloyd George, who at least has been battered with the same charges while attempting very similar things. Mr. Sherrill gives an interesting picture of the two premiers together. Like many of the other illustrative flashes in his book, it has the virtue of indicating a great deal more than it portrays:

Briand has a very pleasant sense of humor. When at the famous March, 1921, meeting in London, Lloyd George, expecting a reasonable indemnity suggestion from the German delegate, Dr. Simmons, found that on the contrary he seemed to be putting the blame for the war on the Allies, and almost to ask an apology from them to the poor, overburdened Germans, the British Prime Minister penciled a brief note to Briand. "In five minutes' time, you will hear that it is we who owe money to the Germans." Briand said nothing, but took out his watch and placed it on the table before him. At the end of exactly five minutes he pushed the watch over to Lloyd George with a paper on which he had written "Give it to him, and give him your shirt along with it."

Even sentiment, so potent a factor with all Latins, never prevents Briand's sense of humor from functioning. One day during the war Briand, then Prime Minister, after lunching at a restaurant in the Rue Royale with Lloyd George, set out on foot with him for the Foreign Office. On their way through the Place de la Concorde, they stopped before the statue of Strasbourg, draped in crepe, and covered with banners and flowers by devoted Alsatis. Said Lloyd George with much emotion, "I can never see that statue in its trappings of woe without an unspeakable sadness coming over me." Briand grasped his hand, saying, "Rest assured that when this war ends, we will remove those sad draperies." The distinguished Briton became thoughtful for a moment and then continued, "Perhaps, if some day after the war I should see in Berlin a statue of the German left bank of the Rhine similarly draped with mourning, I would feel the same emotion." "Ah!" replied Briand, "learn to control your emotions, lest you should also come upon another draped statue in Berlin representing the German colonies that the war had forced you to take from Germany—it wouldn't do then to show too much distress!"

Of the two statesmen Lloyd George would seem to be the less sincere, or at least the shrewder diplomat. He has the same hardihood in challenging long odds, but an even greater equanimity in meeting the ups and downs of the game, and a more malicious irony in confounding his opponents. He has Briand's sympathetic appeal, when he chooses to employ it, coupled with a wit that can be as swift and deadly as a rapier thrust, when he prefers to be sardonic. His orientation to conflicting ideas is quicker than Briand's and he has the Celtic gift of eluding his own theories, when they prove inopportune. A man who couples the talents of an actor with those of statesman and economist—to say nothing of a Welshman's native endowment of more than Jesuitical guile—is baffling even to the Anglo-Saxon mind, and must be almost vertiginous to the orderly Latin intelligence. And a statesman who finds as much pleasure and instruction in the society of children as in discussion with the master diplomats of Europe shows also a balance and perspective that is the prerogative of genius. No other term would seem to describe his amazingly versatile mind. Sherrill attributes his vogue with his countrymen to the fact that they are a nation of gamblers, and like to take a chance on a winner. Certainly the prime minister's record in the matter of results is in his favor. As a statesman he is also a new experience in English parliamentary history, which boasts a number of great figures with gifts analogous to his, but none with the same qualities in combination. Time will prove, perhaps, that in the range of his mental and moral qualities he is unique in the governmental history of the world.

One of his best weapons in debate is a searching irony that is all the more effective for being free from any overt suggestion of malice. He maintains an exasperating good humor—the accomplishment, perhaps, that his enemies find hardest to forgive him. He has inaugurated a witty tournament in the House of Commons by stimulating in the opposition an ill-advised hope of demolishing him with his own weapons. Lord Robert Cecil, who evidently plans to make Grey the next premier, is the only challenger to emerge from the contest with some shreds of dignity. Asquith, as appears from his speech a month ago against the Coalition Liberals, resorts to the old pose of solemn and misinterpreted dignity, and attempts to confuse his rival by a "more in sorrow than in anger" attitude, allowing his face to be momentarily contorted at the recollection that while he once looked on Lloyd George as a faithful friend, he is now "an old man, and too disillusioned to look for gratitude in politics." There was a time when this sentimental trick would have brought down the house, but a spirit of youthful expectancy has invaded Parliament, and the sigh with a violin obligato no longer chimes with the spirit of a people who have lost much of their reverence for what might be called the school of "silver and old lace."

An interesting example of Lloyd George's repartee at its most pungent, quoted by Mr. Sherrill, was his reply to Sylvia Pankhurst's declaration in a public speech that if he were her husband she would give him poison. "If she were my wife," he retorted, when told of the remark, "I would gladly take poison."

In referring to Sherrill's book, it may be timely to mention a fact to which he has never alluded publicly: the fact that he was the unofficial agent employed by Briand to bring Loucheur and Rathenau together at Wiesbaden. For this great service he received from the French premier last August the Cross of Commander of the Legion of Honor. Among his other distinctions, he is responsible for having founded the series of inter-university athletic contests that developed into the Olympian games. He has been identified with several other movements to increase international co-operation and understanding, and has enjoyed personal contact with the most influential statesmen in Europe.

His curiously vivid and objective portraits of many of these are extremely valuable as living commentaries on the opinions a reader or spectator has to derive by inference. None is more illuminating than the pen picture of Lloyd George, and it deserves more than this fragmentary quotation:

Neatly dressed, his short, well-filled figure with the famous crooked legs that are the joy of the caricaturists soon passed out of my vision and I saw the noble head with its thatch of too long hair, the large eyes that might be blue or brown, that are, in fact, blue in merriment and brown in deeper emotion. I should have lost sight, I say, of his diminutive stature had it not been for a mannerism, meant to hide it, that instead, constantly emphasizes it. With his eye-glass occasionally thrust at me to make a verbal point he would step first towards me and then leaning far back he would step away and then back again, now advancing one shoulder and now the other—the in-and-out action of a trained boxer. The mannerism is that almost always the head leans away from you, just as Colonel Roosevelt's was wont to do, to lend an impression of greater height, but Lloyd George's head inclines generally to one side or the other, which Roosevelt did not. Roosevelt made his points by suddenly leaning towards his man and baring his teeth, but the Welshman makes his by leaning back and screwing up his eyes the better to observe how you take him.

Always there gleamed from between these narrowed lids a something, what was it? certainly not frankness. There ensued a pause as if he waited to see if he had made an impression, and if he had failed, instantly he chose another way to do so. Then, having succeeded, open wide flew the eyes and the franker expression returned.

With these two men, Lloyd George and Briand, more than any other in Europe, rests the destiny of the old world, and, in a considerable degree, our own.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Judge Theodore Brentano's appointment by President Harding as United States Minister to Hungary has been accepted by that country. Judge Brentano has served for more than thirty years on the bench of the Superior Court of Cook County, Illinois.

Dr. Richard Derby of Oyster Bay, son-in-law of the late President Roosevelt, has been nominated by Governor Miller to be manager of the Kings Park State Hospital, Long Island. Colonel Derby served overseas during the war with distinction as a member of the medical corps.

General Ludendorff is an example of loyalty, par excellence. He is still faithful to his former war lord. He was recently interviewed in the study at his home in Berlin, surrounded by mementoes of the old régime, among them being a statue of the former Kaiser. The general insisted on the latter being included in the photograph that the interviewer took.

Eliot Harlow Robinson is one of the most versatile of young American writers. The law is his profession. Mr. Robinson is a legal associate of Boston's fighting attorney-general, Mr. Allen. Robinson is a public speaker much in demand, a musician of note, a poet, and the author of many successful novels. During the late war he served as director of athletics in the French army. Mr. Robinson is a Bostonian.

Former Assistant Secretary of the Navy Gordon Woodbury has had one of the most sensational adventures in yachting history. In a hurricane off Cape Charles, Mr. Woodbury was swept over the rail of his yacht, the Half Moon, and then was miraculously returned to his craft by another high wave. Several of his crew were also washed overboard, but all save one were rescued. The Half Moon was formerly the Germania, private yacht of the ex-Kaiser.

Edward R. Houghton was recently elected president of the Houghton Mifflin Company to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of George H. Mifflin. Mr. Houghton, who is a nephew of the late H. O. Houghton, the founder of the house, lives in Cambridge. He has been connected with the company since his graduation from college in 1893. He has more recently held the position of managing director of the Riverside Press, as well as being a member of the executive committee of the board of directors.

For some time France has had a new diplomatic office, that of Ambassador of the Air. And for that delicate function, for which not every one is fit, a woman, Mlle. Adrienne Bolland, has been nominated. This intrepid aviatrix was the first, it will be remembered, who flew over the Cordilleras of the Andes. This feat made her famous in South America. This renown incited the French government to accredit Mlle. Bolland to the Republic of Argentina, where she will represent France in all matters concerning aviation. Mme. Bolland has left for Buenos Ayres, equipped with all diplomatic powers.

THE CHEVALIER DE BOUFFLERS.

Nesta Webster Chronicles a Romance of the French Revolution.

In his ballade concerning the fair ladies of antiquity François Villon implored the prince to whom his verses were inscribed never to ask where all this beauty had vanished except with the afterword (which has since become the pet refrain of melancholy minor poets); "Where are the snows of yesteryear?" With regard to the exquisite dames whose fantasies helped excite the French Revolution, there are several other afterwords that would suit quite as well. The reader who has followed their dainty heels through the indecorous corridors of Louis XV's court will feel more disposed to inquire, "Where were the husbands of yesteryear?" The answer is probably that the gentlemen were similarly occupied. If all this is true, it is remarkable that any of the noble French genealogies survived this period, and that the modern French aristocrat, in tracing back his lineage, is not baffled here by the intricate ramifications of his family tree.

We have no intention, however, of repeating the discourtesy of Mark Twain in his argument with Bourget about grandmothers, and are convinced that the romancers and historians, in the interests of piquancy, have subtly exaggerated the domestic vagaries of the time. Historical periods are apt to be interpreted in terms of their most vivid characters, to the neglect of the bon homme moyen, or average and regular fellow who supplies the true continuity between the generations. In her biography of "The Chevalier de Boufflers" Miss Webster has had the happiness to select a man who represented both—who epitomized all the arts, graces, and light frivolities of his class and time, but joined to them the undertone of seriousness without which no picture of a society can be complete. It is to be remembered that the flower of the aristocracy to which Boufflers belonged supported America in her fight for freedom, that not a few, like him, fought for the ideals of such foreign patriots as Paoli, and that the ideas of liberty and humanity which resulted in the revolt of the masses toward the end of the century had many an ardent supporter among the classes usually pictured as wanton triflers with the serious facts of life.

This does not contradict the fact that the prevailing tone of French aristocracy in the eighteenth century was artificial and insouciant to a degree. Louis XV's cynical motto, "Things will last my time," was the sentiment of too many members of his court, whose careers reflected the carelessness with which they were ushered into this life and out of it. Of that school, the Chevalier de Bouffler's vivacious mother was a superlative type, and the circumstances of her son's birth were not calculated to engender in him a solemn view of human destiny:

One spring evening, May 30, 1738, the Court assembled at Commercy for the summer were awaiting the return of Mme. de Boufflers from the neighboring town of Bar-le-Duc, whither she had driven off gayly to transact some business. Her health at this moment demanded care, for her second child was shortly expected, and a serious-minded magistrate of the town had therefore been requested to escort her back. But the hour was growing late and the travelers were not yet in sight—what could have delayed their arrival?

At last a cloud of dust was observed in the distance, which, as it rolled nearer, proved to be indeed the long-expected post-chaise moving heavily along the road; but when finally it drew up before the steps of the château no sprightly marquise appeared from the interior; instead, the magistrate, a "grave and reverent seigneur," descended slowly to the ground, holding in his arms a bundle from which peeped out the tiny crumpled face of a new-born infant.

Bathed in confusion, the magistrate proceeded to explain the contretemps which had delayed their arrival. The post-chaise was half-way between Bar-le-Duc and Commercy when Madame la Marquise became aware of the imminent arrival of the child she was expecting. No village was in sight nor any passer-by who could come to the rescue in this emergency; there was nothing for it, therefore, but to stop the carriage and take refuge on the grass by the roadside. . . . He himself had performed the part of accoucheur.

Little had the magistrate dreamt, when he set out with the marquise from Bar-le-Duc that he would be required to perform so strange an office! No one who knew the lady, however, was surprised. Mme. de Boufflers never could do things like other people, nor, they were destined to discover, could the baby. Who, looking down on its absurd small face that memorable spring evening, dreamt that this little son of the irresponsible marquise would be one day known to the world as the most original man of his time—the famous Chevalier de Boufflers?

The marquise was one of the chief ornaments of the court of Stanislas, Duke of Lorraine, a dethroned King of Poland, who owed the duchy to the marriage of his daughter with Louis, and who had set up a miniature Versailles at Lunéville. Mme. de Boufflers here divided her attention between the amorous king and his no less susceptible courtiers, with music, books, and games of cavagnole and comète as minor diversions. In her diversified scroll of nights and days the chevalier's birth was so small an item that afterwards she was unable to recall the year in which it had occurred:

The king, now nearly sixty, far from handsome and of enormous bulk, could not hope to retain the exclusive favors of the marquise. He had long since recognized in his chancellor, M. de la Galaisière, a serious rival; but he accepted the situation with all the philosophy of the day. There was also the poet Saint-Lambert, created by himself a marquise—"a great jackanapes and a very tiny genius," said Horace Walpole—with whom Mme. de Boufflers acted in a pastoral play as Chloe to his Daphnis; but of all her adorers—and they were many—the only one for whom she had any real affection was the young comptroller of finances, Monsieur Devau.

"Panpan"—for the name given him by Mme. de Graffigny was soon adopted by all his friends—was one of those comfortable, selfish, sympathetic creatures so often loved by idle women. With Mme. de Boufflers he was, says the Journal de Collé, an "animal privé"—or, as we should say today, a "tame cat"—and played the part of a sort of confidential butler ("une espèce de valet de chambre bel esprit,") whereby he insured her undying affection. The bearer of a nickname is usually a loveable sort of person, and so Devau, having been the "cher Panpan" of Mme. de Graffigny, became the "tendre veau" of Mme. de Boufflers; "Mon veau, mon charmant veau," we find her writing to him at the end of her life, long after other lovers were dead or forgotten.

Whilst Mme. de Bouffler was amusing herself at Lunéville with bergeries—as the eighteenth century aptly described the love affairs of the period—the baby, Stanislas, whose arrival had proved so untimely was sent away to a nourrice at Haroué, the country house of his grandmother the Princesse de Craon, mother of the Marquise de Boufflers.

The young chevalier's early training was of the same pattern:

How soon did the boy looking on at all this realize the truth about the "belle maman" he adored?—understand the true significance of these bergeries in which she played so charming a part? It is impossible to know how the realization came to him, but when it did come there were only two ways in which to meet it—with disgust, or with cynical indifference—Stanislas took the latter course. There was nothing, indeed, in his early influences to give him the most elementary ideas of morality, and since, at this discovery, one must either laugh or weep, he chose to laugh—and to continue to adore his mother. Yet he was at heart strangely serious. The attention he paid the sermons of Père Menoux, the court chaplain, so impressed the king that he exclaimed, "The boy is a flower destined to adorn the altar!" and henceforth the question of an ecclesiastical career for "Pataud" was often discussed by his mother and the king.

Meanwhile, the abbé to whom his education was confided was the last person in the world to increase the boy's respect for the church. "L'abbé Porquet" was a little fragile wreck of a man, yet so full of wit and gaiety that the king and Mme. de Boufflers were both delighted by him.

The first evening he was asked to say grace at the royal table disclosed his entire lack of religious knowledge.

"L'abbé," said the king, "will you repeat the Bénédicté?" Porquet "regretted deeply," but—he did not know it! Theology, he proceeded to explain later, did not interest him; he preferred Voltaire. But the principal thing in life was to enjoy oneself.

These sentiments, needless to say, found a ready echo in the minds of Lunéville, but the king, who believed in maintaining a respect for religious observances, felt it his duty to remonstrate with Porquet when he too openly expressed his skeptical opinions.

"L'abbé," he remarked pleasantly, "you must really moderate your views. Try to believe in the religion of which you are the apostle—I give you a year to do it in."

As the lad grew to maturity his parents decided that he was best fitted for a religious career, and to this profession he was ordained, in spite of his energetic protests. Though he and the Abbé Porquet were on terms of convivial comradeship, the character of this preceptor may have had something to do with the protests:

One evening Porquet, overcome by slumber during the performance of his office, stumbled over the words with startling results. The chapter for the day was out of Genesis, and described how God appeared in a dream to Jacob; but instead of saying, "Dieu apparut en songe à Jacob," the sleepy abbé read aloud this surprising sentence: "Dieu apparut en singe à Jacob."

"What!" cried the king in bewilderment, "surely you meant to say 'en songe'?"

But the abbé had no intention of admitting his mistake. Drawing himself up with dignity, he replied: "Ah, sire, with God all things are possible!"

The possession of such a ready wit could not fail to delight Mme. de Boufflers, and a laughing flirtation sprang up between them. Verses of the most daring kind flowed from the pen of the marquise, who found a new pastime in teasing the little "abbé." The beginning of a poem she once sent to him gives a strange idea of the terms she was on with her son's preceptor:

Jadis je plus à Porquet
Et Porquet m'avait su plaire:
Il devenait plus coquet;
Je devenais moins sévère. . . .

It is difficult to imagine that Mme. de Boufflers could ever have been very severe, and Porquet was certainly the most amusing addition to the laughing world of Lunéville.

The chevalier, again in spite of his entreaties, was sent to Paris to receive his clerical training, but his rebellious spirit refused to conform to priestly restrictions, and a series of scandalizations followed that resulted in his abandonment of the priesthood. One of these was his publication of a romance called "Aline," which had an enormous vogue in the court, but none whatever in the seminary of Saint Sulpice. Thus discouraged, Boufflers plunged into the gay life of the time, and by his talents as an artist in pastel drawing, music, and satirical verse, as well as high-spirited conversation, won great favor. Sent on diplomatic missions, he proved a more lively than discreet ambassador, as when he arrived with a swollen cheek at the court of the corpulent Princess Christine of Saxony, and being ill received, wrote a poem to the "Puffy Princess" in which he attributed her coldness to the fact that he "bore on his face the half of her attractions." Followed wanderings as a painter in Switzerland and Hungary, and his return to regale Voltaire with sober and humorous impressions of the lands he had visited. Meanwhile his mother, the marquise, had been diverting herself after her fashion with new admirers, among them the Count of Tressan, who had been driven to Lunéville from Versailles by the displeasure of Mme. de Pompadour. Tressan was a redoubtable wooer, but he did not carry the citadel at one assault:

Baffled thus in his direct methods of attack, Tressan adopted a course curiously characteristic of the eighteenth century. Love, in this romantic age, was a malady to which every one was so liable that no one, falling a victim to it, felt it necessary to conceal the symptoms. Thus one lover would confide in another as an influenza patient might compare notes with a fellow-sufferer on the stages of the disease. It was, therefore, quite natural that Tressan, tortured by the pangs of an unrequited love for Mme. de Boufflers, should write to her old lover, Panpan, who, having passed that way himself, might be expected to sympathize with the sufferings of another victim to the malady.

"I can not tell you, my dear Panpan," we find him writing frankly, "all that I have endured since yesterday . . . you know, my dear Panpan, what my feelings are . . . the wildest passion has overcome me, and reflection has not yet restored my reason. . . . You must have seen for days how she has overwhelmed me with disdain, irony, and persiflage. . . . endeavor, my dear Panpan, to discover her reasons. . . ." He longs to leave a kiss in her hair, to hide his aching heart in one of her little pink slippers—"dans une de ces jolies mules couleur de roses quoique je ne suis pas sûr cependant qu'il put s'y loger."

Apparently, however, the lady was not always cruel, for the letters convey hints of visits paid by her to his garden in Toul, where every flower reminds him agonizingly of her presence; and there were happy hours, too, when, seated by her harpsichord, the "divine warbler" (la divine fauvette), as he called her, sang to him alone.

A random correspondence kept mother and son au fait as to each other's adventures:

Mme. de Boufflers, though delighted with her son's literary talent—for his letters were read by every one at Lunéville and in Paris—was far too lazy to send many replies, and in his last letter to her the chevalier remarks: "I see that I shall have to return to Lunéville and help you to write to me." "Le plus errant des chevaliers" longed only now to wander to one spot on the earth's surface, and that was Lunéville. "You, ma chère maman, as you are worth more than everything that amuses me here, in order to break the bonds that keep me, send word that you are ill and want me—that would be a reason for throwing up everything and flying back to you. But don't go and put it vulgarly, for I shall be obliged to show your letter!" (N'allez pas vous y prendre grossièrement, parce que je serai obligé de montrer votre lettre.)

Apparently even at this stage of her life the pen of the marquise could hardly be trusted not to overstep the bounds of propriety, and one can only hope a decorous reply was forthcoming. It contained, at any rate, the necessary summons, for soon after the chevalier took leave of the sorrowing Voltaire and started on his homeward journey.

On the death of King Stanislas, Mme. de Boufflers came to Paris, and found that a relation of hers, the Duchess of Boufflers had somewhat exceeded her own reputation:

The duchesse, then thirty-seven and at the height of her successes, was one of the most scandalous women of her day. At the Court of the Regent her gallantries had been of so outrageous a description that the Comte de Tressan—the lover of the Marquise de Boufflers—had immortalized her in a poem beginning with these daring lines:

Quand Boufflers parut à la cour
On eut vu la Mère d'Amour.
Chacun s'empresait à lui plaire,
Et chacun l'avait à son tour.

The duchess, whose strongest weapon through life was an imperturbable sang-froid, declared herself delighted with the verse when it reached her ears.

"It is so clever," she remarked to the Comte de Tressan, whom she shrewdly suspected of having composed it, "that I would not only forgive the author, but I would embrace him!" The guileless Tressan immediately fell into the trap. "Well, Madame la Duchesse, it was I!" But, instead of the promised embrace, the unfortunate poet found himself soundly boxed on both ears.

However, the individuality of the marquise brooked no competition, and her renown for wit and charm was rivaled only by her son's:

Meanwhile, the Chevalier de Boufflers, still in Paris with his mother and sister, was at the height of his popularity. Every mémoire of the period refers to his bons mots and his verses. "The chevalier's bon mot is excellent," wrote Horace Walpole to Mr. Conway: "and so is he. He has as much bouffonnerie as the Italians, with more wit and novelty. His impromptu verses are often admirable. Get Mme. du Defand to show you his 'Embassy to the Princesse Christine.'" Mme. du Defand, who often mentions the chevalier in her letters, had apparently a peculiar fondness for his disrespectful verses on the "Puffy Princess," for we hear of her singing them after supper to the assembled company at a party given by the King of Sweden—a strange performance for an old lady of seventy-four!

The chevalier's own supper parties were some of the gayest in Paris. "You have supped with the Chevalier de Boufflers," Walpole writes again: "did he act everything in the world, and sing everything in the world, and laugh at everything in the world?"

Several of his biographers have described Boufflers as ugly, but "Mme. de Créquy" tells us this was a slanderous legend started by a jealous rival, the Abbé de Talleyrand, who, at the time of the publication of "Aline, Reine de Golconde," attempted to pass himself off as the author of the famous story. Boufflers, hearing of the imposture, waited till he met the Abbé de Talleyrand in the salon of the Duchesse de Choiseul, and then broke a pause in the conversation by asking him genially whether he happened to know the works of Rabelais.

"Obviously," said the abbé drily.

"Obviously? Yet not well!" said the chevalier.

"Dare I ask you why?"

"Monsieur l'abbé," answered the author of "Aline" with a bow, "I asked you whether you knew the works of Rabelais because I had omitted to tell you that it was I who wrote them."

"Out of revenge for this," Mme. de Créquy says, "the abbé went about saying everywhere that the chevalier was intolerably ugly, and this is a point I can not admit. Monsieur de Boufflers has nothing in his face that is not dignified and noble, intelligent and witty, and this is all that can be required of a man's appearance. . . ."

It was about this time that the chevalier met the Countess of Sabran, and there began a long and sincere attachment that forms one of the great love stories of history. Around this idyll, as against the cold-hearted excesses of the court, and the brutal violence of the revolutionary background, the author weaves an enchanting tale, that is none the less magical for being true. If the style is a little too feminine for the subject matter, there is room for a book by a woman on an historical period of which men have been, hitherto, the almost exclusive interpreters.

THE CHEVALIER DE BOUFFLER: A ROMANCE OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION. By Nesta H. Webster. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $6.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending February 23, 1922, were $118,200,000, an increase of $16,500,000 over the corresponding week of last year.

In a rising stock market nearly all of the several hundred stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange advance in price. Some have extensive rises; others very slight ones. The logical thing to do, therefore, is to make an effort to select stocks with greatest possibilities of appreciation and a minimum of risk. Such a selection can be confined to, say, its earnings outlook, and possibility of resumption of or increases in dividends.

In certain groups, the possibility of very large profits available for dividends on the common stocks during the next year or so seems, at this time, rather slim. Therefore, the stocks in the following groups may be dismissed from further consideration: sugars and food stocks, leathers, papers, motors and motor accessories (except Studebaker), rubbers and tires, coals, chemicals (except Davison), shipping, agricultural, or farming. The competition in all these lines is likely to be too severe and the demand not urgent enough to permit of large profits.

The groups remaining for consideration are: equipments, building stocks, railroads, public utilities, mining, steels, oils, tobaccos, electrics, chain stores, specialties.

The equipment stocks appear to offer the best opportunities. On the best authority it is stated that the railroads must spend a billion dollars a year for some time to rehabilitate their lines. The equipment companies piled up huge profits during the war period and lost none in the post-war slump in business. There are good possibilities of extra dividend distributions in such stocks as American Locomotive, Baldwin, and American Car & Foundry.

A building boom is now in progress and the outlook for an immense amount of building construction is bright. Scarcely anywhere during the past few years has building construction kept pace with the normal increase in population and the volume of business. Present low costs and large supplies of materials, labor, and money will furnish the basis for a building boom. Otis Elevator and United States Realty will profit from increased building operations.

The railroad situation is improving greatly and is bound to continue in that direction, with increased emphasis when general business revives and the wages of unionized railroad labor are reduced. In this group may be mentioned Texas & Pacific, Pere Marquette, St. Louis-San Francisco, Rock Island, St. Louis-Southwestern, Atchison, and Southern Pacific.

Every one knows that the world is short of copper and that the closing down of the mines has automatically reduced the supply. The price of copper has been pushed down as far as it will go. For some time to come the movements in its price should be upward, but it may be slow. The complete recovery of copper depends upon the revival of business at home and settled production abroad. As the prospects indicate that this will be gradual—especially the restoration of foreign demand—it follows that the copper market will reflect ease. Anaconda, Utah, and Chile are good selections in this group.

The consumption and production of petroleum have been increasing with great rapidity and the future demand will tax production resources. In spite of improvements in production or discovery of new fields, the indications are that petroleum prices during the next few years will move upward. The best possibilities in oil stocks appear to exist in Cosden, Phillips Petroleum, and California Petroleum.

In recent years the demand for tobacco, especially cigarettes, has grown tremendously and the industry is rather well centralized. P. Lorillard and United Retail Stores are the writer's selections in this group.

The outlook for the electrical business is excellent and the stocks in this group are recommended: Allis-Chalmers, Westinghouse, and General Electric.

Studebaker is in a class by itself in the motor group. Through constant experiments, the company has perfected vast improvements in its car, which is priced at a very reasonable figure. Its sales have been handled by one of the best selling organizations in America. There is every indication that the stockholders will receive during 1922 more than the present 7 per cent. dividend.

One of Wall Street's "golden rules" is: "Buy the stock that won't go down in a bear market—it will probably lead the next rise."

The widely-known investment firm of Cyrus Peirce & Co. is now established in new quarters on the tenth floor of the Insurance Exchange Building on California Street. The firm, which has occupied offices on the fourth floor of this building for about five years, has grown so rapidly that the old quarters have been found inadequate to cope with the business in hand. Almost the entire tenth floor has been taken up, and eventually the firm will occupy the whole floor. San Francisco is the headquarters of the firm, which has branches all up and down the Pacific Coast. All operations in its Oakland, San Jose, Fresno, Eureka, Stockton, Los Angeles, Pasadena, San Diego, and Seattle branches are directed from the local office.

Dillon, Read & Co. and Cyrus Peirce & Co. are participating in an offering of 150,000,000 guilders Kingdom of the Netherlands (Holland) fifty-year 6 per cent. sinking fund bonds, dated March 1, 1922, due March 1, 1972. Non-callable for ten years. Coupon bonds in denomination of 2500 guilders (at par of exchange $1005). Principal and interest payable at the head office of Nederlandsche Bank in Amsterdam in guilders and in New York through the office of Dillon, Read & Co., as fiscal agents for the loan in the United States, in dollars at the current rate of exchange prevailing at the time of payment.

Trading in listed bonds on the New York Stock Exchange during January exceeded all previous records for that month. The total turnover was $416,772,900, exceeding the sales of January, 1921, by $121,059,800, and January, 1920, by $54,357,900. Heavy purchases by the government, corporations, and individuals brought the dealings in Liberty and Victory bonds and notes up to the enormous total of $225,402,300. And this is only half the story, for a tremendous volume of bond sales was handled during the month in dealer-to-consumer or "over-the-counter" business, mainly in unlisted bonds, especially of the public utility variety, only a very small percentage of which are listed on the Stock Exchange.

It is not surprising that after this big January splurge bond dealings should reflect hesitancy and in some cases develop reactionary tendencies. Most recoveries, as in the security markets and in general business, are accomplished through successive waves of advancement rather than through uninterrupted upward progress. The market goes ahead strongly, slips back a bit, and then resumes its upward course.

The recovery in bond prices began, under rather unfortunate auspices, early in the fall of 1920, only to be interrupted and almost entirely wiped out as a result of the stringency in the money markets at the close of the year. The money pressure relieved, quotations rebounded early in 1921, and later reacted because of the acute business depression. The piling up of bank reserves and the release of large sums usually employed in industry began to be reflected in lower rates in the money market early last summer, and it was this development that started the recent sharp upward swing in bond prices.

The recovery in the highest grade of investment issues has outdistanced that in lower grade bonds. Gains have been so persistently maintained over the past six months that some gilt-edged securities are now selling on a yield basis only about one-half of 1 per cent. above their minimum of the past two years. It is perfectly plain that such advances have about reached their limit, at least until taxes on incomes are sharply reduced, or done away with altogether. Along with the natural check of diminishing yields, a further factor of restraint has been found in the reviving prospects of soldier bonus legislation.

Associated with the new concern are Frank Weeden, until recently of the firm of Bradford, Weeden & Co., and Norman Weeden, his brother. Both are bond men of long experience on the Coast. Their new association together forms the first between brothers in a single concern here. Mr. Weeden has sold out all his interests in the Bradford-Weeden house. Mr. Norman Weeden has had extensive experience with Blyth, Witter & Co. and R. H. Moulton. The new house will deal in a general line of securities.

The stock market has a very different ring these days from that of December and at times last month. Much of the buying which was encouraged by bull activities was on the theory that business would be improving and that the only thing necessary to do to make large profits was to buy stocks and wait. Oftentimes people in buying stocks will recognize the fact that prices are a good deal up from where they had previously been, but if satisfied they will turn out all right eventually they make up their minds to hold through thick and thin in order to reap the ultimate profits. At the present time we are running into a season of very poor earnings reports. Too much attention should not be paid to the comparisons that many of our railroads are making in their net earnings. In the first place, a year ago our railroads were seemingly anxious to spend all they could to show as deplorable net earnings as possible in order to encourage favorable legislation. Toward the end of the year, in most cases, they had to cut expenses to the bone in order to make any such showing of earnings as would encourage their security holders. Especially was this necessary where new obligations were to be offered. Consequently now, although we see gross earnings decrease from 10 to 25 per cent. all over the country, the majority of railroads for December are showing net results better than was the case for December, 1920. It would seem that the railroads can not continue much longer to cut down their operating expenses, and, as further reduction in freight rates went into effect last month, we may look for some rather lugubrious reports when the January statements begin to come in.

At the same time there has been some pretty fair quality of buying in several of the low-priced rail stocks. The Toledo, St. Louis & Western situation has been entirely cleared up by the compromise of the Chicago & Alton litigation, and these stocks now are beginning to reflect the splendid accumulative buying that has been going on in them for some months. It looks as if the preferred stock will show for 1921 earnings equivalent to several times the dividend of 4 per cent. to which it is entitled and, in fact, the common will reveal an earning power that will make its price seem ridiculously low in comparison with some of the standard dividend-paying rails. There has also been some very good buying in Texas & Pacific and, from time to time, in Rock Island as well as in a few other stocks of road operating in the Southwest.

The United States Steel Corporation shows rather meagre earnings for the last quarter of last year and, in view of the unsatisfactory manner in which the steel trade has started the new year, the prospects are not brilliant for the current quarter. Meanwhile most of the independent steel companies are operating at a loss. There has been much talk of mergers, but it is difficult to suit every one concerned in efforts of this nature, and it is a question whether the market has not at times been too optimistic in this regard.

The majority of the Street seems to think that big business will open up with the spring. It is patent that a certain amount of business that is not now present will come with spring, just as the ice man comes in summer and the coal man in winter.

There are a good many public utilities that have turned the corner, and some stocks in this section of the list that are not among the dividend payers are in a way to become standard investment issues of their class. There are remarkable opportunities here and there for those of large income who naturally do not desire to pay more than is necessary in taxes in investment of substantial amounts in securities that do not pay a dividend but that will eventually not only pay, but will pay well and will in all human probability be recognized as good investments. When that time comes, of course, the stocks which may be picked up at low prices now will probably have appreciated in market value 50 to 100 per cent., and there will also be much less stringent tax requirements, so that the so-called "income-tax dodger" would thus be doubly feathering his nest.—The Trader.

The links in the commercial chain that bind this country to Latin America have been during the last decade as strong at least as those that connect many of her own states. The determining factor, not proximity only, not sentiment, has certainly not been banking nor finance (says the Review, issued by Strassburger & Co.). The agency of commerce that has produced this profitable condition is our position as the principal market for what Latin America produces. We pay the best prices, we consume more.

It is the obvious that is never seen and it is our blindness to that which others are seeing clearly that accounts for an evident weakening in our position in this field. This is not explained, as superficial observers never tire of repeating, by our aggressive methods. International trade is the outcome and the reward of aggressiveness. Intelligently applied, we need not fear a superabundant endowment of that quality. The causes lie deeper.

Critics in high places—how they got there is a mystery—consume much paper teaching those who know better than to read what they write, how export trade is developed. What they do not say is how it is to be retained in the face of intelligently directed competition. Export trade is often the result of accidental, exceptional, temporary circumstances. It is never maintained for long by anything but a persistent, intense study of the changing conditions that influence the countries with which the trade is done. It is not enough to study the requirements of those to whom we wish to continue to sell. A study of their productive potentialities, accompanied by a helping hand in development, is of at least equal importance. We must assist them to produce for our manufacturing use the things that are essential to a continuance of our export trade with them.

In the case of Latin American countries we have recognized this to a certain extent, but discretion has outrun valor, and although we would seem better able to play the part than any others, it is a fact that inroads are being made on a position that we could easily maintain and improve, could we be persuaded to cultivate longer vision.

For we ought to realize that our preponderance is of but recent growth. Dating back, in the case of the northern countries as far back as 1910 (in some cases as much as twenty years before that), in the case of South America, both Great Britain and Germany sold more before the war than we did. 1914 put Germany behind us in the race, in 1915 Great Britain fell behind. Both are fighting for a comeback, and there are others.

Empire Refineries, Inc., subsidiary of Cities Service Company, have completed arrangements for the opening of their refinery at Gainesville, Texas, on March 1st. The company's business has increased to such an extent during the past few months as to render necessary an additional supply of refined oils. Gasoline and fuel oil are the two products where consumption has been well maintained during the fall and winter and available stocks for both products for spring and summer consumption are much needed. An increase in export demand also plays an important part in connection with the products from this company's refineries. The opening of the Gainesville plant will bring the operations of Empire Refineries, Inc., up to about 75 per cent. of their 1920 activities.

BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

The recipe for a best seller is one perpetually sought by pot-boilers not to mention invidiously authors in general. The sad thing is that a recipe for successful pot-boiling, like the recipe for happiness, is not found for the seeking. Perhaps the secret is that there is no formula or royal road to best selling. The product when it happens is the result of spontaneous combustion of the author's temperament and the popular taste of the moment. Due to the flexibility of the latter element and the immense variety of the authorial temperament, it is impossible to reduce the thing to a chemical formula. The graph which would chart its curve would have to be thrown on the silver sheet and the fast motion camera used. Unfortunately the author can not turn the crank of his inspiration in any such ratio. Unhappily, publishing houses do not produce with the speed of the current news films. It remains for the combination which is genius, fate, or fool luck, according to the point of view, to produce a best seller. More often than not the lucky accident befalls an already bloated author on the more familiar principle that nothing succeeds like success. Too seldom is the unhappy pot-boiler the accidental discoverer of the current combination of popular fancy and his own fancy. Perhaps the steam from pot-boiling is not conducive to fancy. Perhaps the lack of it is even more blighting.

Nevertheless there is a horrible fascination in studying the lineaments of a best seller and Mr. Hutchinson's phenomenal success, "If Winter Comes," is the very palpable example that one must study. There is practically no other up-to-date text-book. There is nothing to indicate the fate of the best seller about "If Winter Comes." It has neither the stamp of Harold Bell Wright nor of Gyp. It is neither seraphic nor salacious. In that respect it is extraordinary. There are lots of good books that fall into neither of the above categories, but they are infrequently best sellers. True, they often become classics. So far there is certainly no automatic route to multitudinous editions. What is it about "If Winter Comes" that has captivated the reading public to the extent of buying 285,000 copies? It is not a particularly well-written or "well-done" book, but the public never has been a stickler on that point. Quite the contrary. But "If Winter Comes" is not trashy. There are long passages in it—the incoherent monologue of the solicitor friend—that are unconsciously tedious, and that are only read, or painfully skimmed, because they contain so much that is vital to plot continuity. The story, theme aside, is melodramatic. The theme is explicitly developed, but the story is obviously made to fit. Still it is nowhere near the domain of trashy fiction. It is serious and sincere, and it makes no bid for the sensational.

One of the book's best bids for rapid selling is its title. "If Winter Comes" is an intriguing title. If one is unfamiliar with Shelley, it may mean anything, and an unlimited promise is always alluring. It is of the nature of gambling. One pays two dollars and takes a chance. If you do know the line from Shelley, or if you turn the title-page and read it inscribed there, you are reassured. It is distinctly optimistic. Such a book ought to be a good tonic. The ultimate effect on the swelling editions is the same. Indubitably, a good title is an excellent thing.

Moreover, "If Winter Comes," unlike many a book with a catch title, lives up to its name. Its name is the theme and one is cheered, remarkably cheered, by having an optimistic theme driven home for a change. It is a good antidote for one's too easy cynicism, which alas! is only fostered by the lugubrious sort of fiction—the most optimistic thing about which was that it was fiction—that has been absorbing popular interest. But there, we fear, is the precise explanation of why a nice book like "If Winter Comes" is popular just now. It is the inevitable reaction from "Main Street" and "Moon Calf." The path of the pendulum oscillates. Tout pas, tout cas, tout se remplace.

Judging Mr. Hutchinson's book aside from its inevitable qualities as a best seller, it is, critically speaking, remarkable chiefly for its characterization. The character of Mark Sabre is one that will live in the memory. Nona is a charming woman, but she is comparatively a lay figure. The garrulous Hapgood is an infernal bore who will undoubtedly live long indeed on that painful reminiscence. It is well and good to represent natural conversation on the part of your puppets, but a character who talks pages with only gasps for pauses serves only as a reminder of one's most tedious acquaintance. He is the last person one wishes to encounter between covers. Mabel, on the other hand, is awfully well done. She is done to the life. She is even more natural than her protagonist, Mark, and infinitely more alive than the lovely Nona. Still, the remarkable, the original thing about "If Winter Comes" is the creation of Mark Sabre. Unharmonious and shrewish wives have been done before in fiction. They are, in fact, a great standby of authors, most of whom, from Milton to Carlyle—one dares not mention later cases—have been provided with a perpetual model. One suspects a kindly fate of providing authors with such wives so that they may always have an inspiration for copy, like the blue bird, at home, close to them. A charming wife, like Nona, would make very poor copy. Her only excuse for existence is the previous existence of Mabel. She is needed merely for relief—artistically and otherwise. But the creation of Mark Sabre is original, if not actually unique. It is a portrayal of some, though limited, genius as it really is, and not as it has always been brilliantly depicted by authors who saw themselves as they doubtless would have liked to have been. If Mr. Hutchinson's book is anywise autobiographical as regards the portrait of Mark, he is a very honest man. No need to say modest. Our hero is an admirable man. But it requires candor to see oneself as his prototype, sans literary retouching of any sort. That is one reason why it is remarkable that "If Winter Comes" has been a best seller. But a closer inspection suggests that that, after all, may be the explanation. It is the something different we are always seeking. We want it in books even more than in anything else. A book may sell for many reasons. It may make us feel angelic or it may make us feel wicked. Either course is popular. But if it makes us feel clever its success is assured.

Notes of Books and Authors.

George Birmingham, the Irish novelist, whose real name is James Owen Hannay and who is a canon of the Catholic Church, is living in France.

Mr. Alec Waugh, who has a new novel in the press, published "The Loom of Youth" when he was nineteen. His only modern rival in precocity is Mr. Selwyn Jepson. Both the "boy marvels" inherit their literary talent from their fathers. In this connection it has been noted that Thomas Hardy was thirty-two before he wrote "Under the Greenwood Tree," Mr. J. D. Beresford was thirty-eight when "Jacob Stahl" was published, Joseph Conrad was thirty-three when his first novel, "Atmayer's Folly," appeared, and John Galsworthy was thirty-seven when the first of his novels, "The Island Pharisees," was published. Hugh Walpole wrote "The Wooden Horse" at the age of twenty-five, and H. G. Wells published his first novel when he was twenty-nine.

The Duttons have ready for immediate publication a new novel by Richard Washburn Child, American Ambassador to Italy. Its title is announced as "The Hands of Nara," and it is said to touch a little upon occult things and to be centrally concerned with the relations between a famous American medical specialist and a young woman from Russia who convinces him finally that the most important factor in life is "the sorcery of something in the soul."

The popular interest these days in the wireless telephone has necessitated the printing of a twelfth edition of A. Frederick Collins' volume, "The Book of Wireless," the publishers, D. Appleton & Co., report. Many amateurs are using this book, not only in making and installing wireless apparatus, but in detecting what is wrong so as to make repairs. It is simple enough for a twelve-year-old boy to understand.

James James, the satirical critic of women, is an Australian, who, the Duttons say, is fairly safe from American Babettes until he yields to the lure of the inevitable lecture tour. Then Heaven help him! His extraordinary name, by the way, is said to be genuine.

The writing of a preface for W. D. McCrackan's forthcoming book on "The New Palestine" (to be published by Page, Boston) was the last piece of literary work done by Lord Bryce before his death. The preface, which has just reached Mr. McCrackan's publishers, is in Lord Bryce's own handwriting and was signed by England's "really great man" just two days before his death.

Lord Bryce's lectures on international relations, given at the Institute of Politics at Williams College, were published by the Macmillan Company on February 21st.

Frederick Chamberlain's important historical work, "The Private Character of Queen Elizabeth," has already gone into a second edition in England, where it was first published a few weeks ago. Dodd, Mead & Co., Inc., will issue the American edition early in March, and, as the author is an American, his book will undoubtedly provoke extended controversy here, as it has in England.

In his selected list of the twelve best translations of 1921 Edward J. O'Brien included "The Seven Wives of Bluebeard," by Anatole France, translated by B. D. Stewart, and "Roumanian Stories," translated by Lucy Byng, both published by the John Lane Company.

A new edition of "Foster's Skat Manual" has just been published by E. P. Dutton & Co. In a preface to this new edition, the third, the author says that "among those who play cards for the intellectual amusement they afford, rather than as an excuse for gambling, skat still holds its position as the best of all card games." He adds that "the game has now all the fascinations and possibilities of auction bridge, with none of its drawbacks," and thinks that "at a no distant day skat may be the national game." The author, R. F. Foster, card editor of the New York Tribune, is one of the most famous international authorities upon card games and is the author of several works, published by E. P. Dutton & Co., on card games, such as "Auction Made Easy," "Foster's Pirate Bridge," and "Russian Bank," of which they have just brought out a new edition, as they have also of his "Foster on Auction."

Carolyn Wells has perhaps the most complete collection of Walt Whitman in the world, with copies of every known edition. She does not especially admire Whitman, but undertook the collection largely because her friends assured her it was a prodigious task, and one foredoomed to failure. Most of her rarest volumes were acquired by the simple expedient of writing to certain booksellers in various parts of the world.

It takes a long time to exhaust the writings of voluminous writers. Nearly all Pepys' is now in print, but it is probable that new letters of Horace Walpole will be gleaned for many a year. Many of Charles Lamb's letters are still unpublished. And now it seems that we are to have a considerable aftermath of Byron's. These hitherto unpublished letters were long in the possession of Lady Dorchester, daughter of Byron's trusted friend, John Cam Hobhouse (Lord Broughton). She appears to have been uncertain what to do with them. On the publication of "Astarte," which she greatly disapproved, she abandoned her intention to leave the collection to Lord Lovelace, and pitched on Lord Rosebery, with the strong encouragement of Mr. John Murray. But in the end she left the letters to Mr. Murray himself, to his astonishment, and now we are to have them in two volumes. They cover most of his life, but particularly the very period hitherto least represented—his social career in London.

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

Stevensoniana.

"Moral Emblems & Other Poems, written and illustrated with wood cuts by Robert Louis Stevenson, first printed at the Davos Press by Lloyd Osbourne and with a preface by the same," is the rather extraordinary legend on the title-page of a recent book. The "preface by the same" elucidates the reader's quandary. It is a very charming preface written by Stevenson's step-son as an explanation of this interesting scrap of Stevensoniana.

When Lloyd Osbourne was a youngster of twelve he and his mother and step-father, who "was an unsuccessful author named Robert Louis Stevenson," lived in a chalet on a Swiss mountainside overlooking the village of Davos-Platz, where Stevenson was staying for his health and "where consumptives coming to get well more often died." The unsuccessful author was dependent, in so far as he was unsuccessful, on his rich parents in Edinburgh. It was all the little family could do to make ends meet at an expensive Swiss resort; and the boy grew used to hearing a sentence which, he says, struck at his heart. It was, "Fanny, I shall have to write to my father." The effect on young Osbourne was to develop early a business instinct. He had the happy idea of a printing press and began business by printing programmes for the Saturday night concerts of the Hotel Belvidere. The business developed and young Lloyd, having successfully written and printed a very slim book of eight pages entitled "Black Canyon, or Life in the Far West," discovered that publishing books was more profitable than printing programmes and lottery tickets. The publisher's stepfather followed this business career to the extent of being fired with a similar ambition.

Their first joint venture was the publishing of a manuscript called "Not I, and Other Poems"—all which figure in the present volume. They occupy four pages, all told. Louis—as his step-son explains he always disrespectfully called him—was enchanted with the success of the booklet, for its entire edition of fifty copies sold immediately. The author declared it the only successful book he had ever written. Another book was in the making when the publisher sighed for illustrations—and the quaint wood cuts that adorn our little volume were the result. Stevenson cut the designs out of fretwood. He found the work of illustrating "Moral Emblems" engrossingly interesting. His step-son overheard him tell a visitor: "I can not tell you what a god-send these silly blocks have been to me. When I can write no more, and read no more, and think no more, I can pass whole hours engraving these blocks in blissful contentment."

"Moral Emblems," ninety copies of it, price sixpence, came out and its reception was sensational, according to its publisher. And the second "Moral Emblems" came out, this time price ninepence, and the youthful publisher amassed upwards of five pounds. Both sets appear in the present volume along with other and later ventures of the "unsuccessful author" and his publishing kinsman. These latter include "The Graver and the Pen," "The Pirate and the Apothecary," and "The Builder's Doom." For the last poem no illustrations were either drawn or engraved. "It marked the decline of a once flourishing business," writes the publisher and partner of R. L. S. But "Moral Emblems and Other Poems" should repeat the earlier successes of the Davos Press.

The Magic of Jewels.

A very interesting book both to the average reader and to the person with a penchant for precious stones and their lore is "The Magic and Science of Jewels and Stones," by Isidore Kozminsky. This is a book that combines the science of gems with a very readable discussion of their history, mythology, and literature. Mr. Kozminsky's book is popular only in the sense that it is easy to read and that it doubtless will be widely read. But his method is exhaustive and his science wears the appearance of extreme accuracy. The book is handsomely illustrated with thirty-nine specimens in color and twenty-two other illustrations.

The Psychic Life of Insects

M. Bouvier, the author of "The Psychic Life of Insects," is known to the scientific world for his articles and monographs on various phases of animal life. His present volume was twenty years in the making. "It was only a little before the war," says its author, "that I gathered up the loose threads and commenced actually to write it." The writing of it was done in the mornings and evenings, the main part of the day being given to other employments. It is thus, evidently, a work of love.

The psychology of insects is not even a familiar term to the average reader, but he as well as the entomologist will find M. Bouvier's book of extraordinary interest. It opens an almost unexplored field to scientists and laymen alike. Much that has hitherto been accounted for by easy application of the word instinct seem, rather, from M. Bouvier's researches, to be the result of memory, experience, and even of an elementary sort of reasoning. For some insects show judgment and judgment implies reason.

"The Psychic Life of Insects" is translated from the French by L. O. Howard, an eminent American entomologist, the author of many scientific monographs. E. L. Bouvier is a member of the Institute of France and professor of entomology of the Museum d'Histoire Naturelle.

Little Rays of Moonshine.

A. P. Herbert, better known as A. P. H. of Punch, has collected a number of his papers from that weekly, the London Mercury, and the Outlook and published them under the appropriate if somewhat Leacockian title, "Little Rays of Moonshine." All of these papers, we must confess, are not equally felicitous, but those that are funny make up for the deficit. If the criterion of funniness is the loudness of one's laughter, the palm should here be awarded to Mr. Herbert's "A Criminal Type." If loud guffawing is a criterion that essay in humor would be awarded a high place anywhere. Unfortunately one is reminded that, like Velasquez' painting which could only be appreciated by artists, and Browning's poetry, which is said to be comprehended only by devotees of Calliope, this particular chef d'œuvre of Mr. Herbert's can be only fully relished by typists, preferably the amateur variety who have learnt by the two or three-finger method. After a "Criminal Type" Mr. Herbert's "Little Guigol" plays are perhaps the most excruciating. Even an ardent admirer of Maeterlinck must collapse helplessly before "The Lurch," which is a Little Guigol that "has somehow got mixed up with M. Maeterlinck." However, on the principle that it is bad to advertise the funniness of a story before you tell it, we should not go any further in the dissecting and appraising of A. R. H.'s humor.

Four Thousand Years Ago.

Excavations made at Kaisargarh, in Asia Minor, have revealed that 2400 years before the Christian era there dwelt there a Babylonian, partly military, partly commercial, colony.

Its history is inscribed in cuneiform characters on tablets brought to light, all dating from the same epoch.

They give curious details of the manner in which this colony was governed by a "prince" and a "prefect," by the side of whom were a "princess" and a "prefectess," who had rights and powers absolutely equal to those of their masculine colleagues.

It is seen that in Burus, as that town was formerly called, the rights of woman were respected. Even as the men, women there could carry on business, bequeath their property and perform the same offices. Archaeologists therefore ask themselves today if there is not some truth in the story of the Amazons who, according to legend, lived in this very part of Asia Minor.

Not far from Burus is the "City of Women," where the later had their colleges and their university. This university comprised two faculties, of arts and of letters, each placed under the direction of a principal, who, however, was a man.

The tablets also indicate that many modern institutions were then known.

On the numerous routes that traversed the country a carrier distributed regularly letters of terra cotta. If they were without envelopes they were not without stamps, and these were of circular form. In one of the letters the writer wishes the carrier a bright moon and a clear sky on his nightly trip.

In some correspondence allusion is made to a kind of check; the messenger had received from the sender instructions to collect from the addressee a sum of money, the amount of which was indicated on the tablet—in brief, something like our postal money order.

The publication of "The Dauphin Louis XVII, The Riddle of the Temple" (Doubleday, Page & Co.), in which M. Lenôtre marshals convincing evidence that the child who died in the temple was not the prince and that the little uncrowned king escaped and lost his identity somewhere in the turmoil and confusion of the revolution, brings to life old legends that young Louis came to America and that our fathers unknowingly harbored the heir to the throne of France. One of the most persistent of these legends is that the child was brought to Canada, where he was adopted by an Indian chief. After several years in the north woods with the Iroquois the boy was sent to Deerfield, Massachusetts, to be educated as a missionary on the invitation of a pious Puritan elder. Young Eleazar Williams, as he was then called, grew up an honor to his profession and became one of the most influential missionaries to his people, but his patrician bearing and his marked resemblance to the Bourbons caused comment wherever he went. When the Rev. Eleazar was an old man, so the story runs, the Prince de Joinville, the son of Louis XVIII and cousin of the little lost Dauphin, paid a visit to the United States, found Eleazar Williams, revealed to him that he was in reality the King of France and offered him a princely revenue if he would sign an abdication in favor of his uncle, but the stout-hearted old Puritan refused to sell his birthright for a fortune, so he died as he had lived, obscure but honored.

THE ORPHEUM.

The bill at the Orpheum has extra good features this week, even the Æsop "Film Fables" being particularly clever and amusing. I wonder, by the way, if Terry, the ingenious deviser of these weekly fables, isn't making his everlasting fortune at it.

Besides the stereotyped features—a highly skilled xylophonist, and two nonsense couples—they show us Robert Emmett Keane in two different acts; and Robert Emmett is worth it. I wondered, when I heard this young man pattering off a perfect imitation of a sporty Englishman and a homesick Scotchman, whether the young man has British blood in his veins. But certainly he has keen observation, a prehensile ear, and an imitative tongue. Also he has keen sense of humor, and he is a very good actor.

This is shown in his second turn, "The Gossipy Sex," in which he acts the rôle of a male dispenser of scandal. In this sketch we also see Claire Whitney, a screen star who appears in this vaudeville act probably as a tender of marital affection. I judge so because, in a short speech made by Mr. Keane following upon evidences of great favor from the audience after he had made a hit in "A Vaudeville Delight," the young man remarked, in a rather proudly proprietary tone, that we would see his wife in "The Gossipy Sex."

The wife, Claire Whitney, is an exceedingly ornate, shapely, and handsomely dressed and modish blonde. Also she acts well. The sketch—which is by Lawrence Grattan—is characterized by easy, slangy dialogue, good situations, and a neat wrap-up.

It is, by the way, quite evident from the favor with which audiences receive "The Gossipy Sex," which is given as a straight play, and not as an exhibition of vaudeville monkey shining, that vaudeville audiences have not outlived their taste for the higher standard in playlets, in spite of having been treated rather shabbily in that respect since the war.

La Bernicia, the excellent star toe-dancer, knows her business in more ways than one, since she is shrewd enough to have first-class support. Her three or four assistant dancers are remarkably limber-jointed young women, and the scenic effect of the Oriental dances, the music of which was judiciously selected and well played, gave the audience the desired Oriental "kick."

Tom Patricola is the nuttiest of amusing "nuts," Irene Delroy is a cutie cute, and the Gordon-Ford pair, or, rather, Burt Gordon, contrive to amuse.

The big feature of the bill is, of course, "The Storm." Evidently this is a tabloid version of a full-length spectacular melodrama which has had its big time in New York, Chicago, and London.

In this tabloid version the action is speeded up to the extreme degree of improbability, for the three characters—two men and a girl—are rivaling, courting, singing, laughing, and dancing only a few minutes before the ominous red glow shows behind the dark Canadian forest.

The setting is excellent; altogether sylvan and far from the madding crowd. A very successful effect of distance is given, and a sense of reality in the forest set is obtained by blending painted scenery with property tall trees in the foreground.

The three principal players—Cecelia Frank, Edward Arnold, and Guy Cunningham—are expert players, the love story interests, and then, by degrees, the unobtrusive crimson glow flickers, fades, deepens, becomes lurid. Soaring flames appear, devouring the unresisting trees; or so it seems. In the foreground each tall trunk is stored with electrical apparatus, and thrilling effects of the trees being devoured to their very hearts are conveyed. Bushes blaze fiercely. The tallest tree totters—or, anyway, we think it does—and falls across the roof of the lonely little log hut, neatly bisecting it. Of course there is a thrilling rescue. The best man shows the mettle of a hero, and with a sigh of relief we perceive that the girl with the fascinating French-Canadian accent has discovered, even in the midst of the terrifying conflagration, where to give her heart and hand.

"The Fire," though, would seem a more appropriate title than "The Storm"; which suggests that some ingenious stage engineer ought to work up a big storm act; wind, rain, thunder, lightning, flood oozing under the threshold; and so on. Audiences would like it; for who does not love the savage moods of old Mother Nature?

AT THE MAITLAND.

As I sat at the Maitland Monday evening, seeing an earnest if not polished performance of "Mrs. Warren's Profession," I found myself deploring the migratory tendencies of players. For here, at the Maitland, is the possibility of having a group of players welded by the hard-working director into a competent stock company. Since Mr. Maitland opened his Stockton Street theatre he has had, at different times, two very good leading men—Messrs. Smythe and Fee—and a very talented leading lady, Mary Morris (who, by the way, recently appeared at Berkeley as "Hedda Gabler" in a local production, under the auspices of the School Women's Club). Lea Penman, although her technique is rather incomplete, is handsome, quick-witted, fairly versatile, and makes a very creditable appearance in rôles especially suited to her temperament and abilities. Muriel Valli was a distinct loss, for she put special study in every characterization. Alice Easton, although not markedly talented, had the makings of a winning young ingénue. And so one could go on, enumerating a number of the members of the Maitland company who, although limited in talent and deficient in training, had the makings of satisfactory players. If they had stayed and submitted to the wear-and-tear discipline of a stock company they could have become one of an acting group of recognized merit, worthy of the plays that are put on at the Maitland Theatre. But as it is the director is continually having a fresh lot to lick into shape.

I really wonder that some of the seasoned old producers who are too worn out to enter into the strenuous competition in the East do not recognize the possibilities here, and come and end their days here heading such an enterprise. San Francisco, Los Angeles, Seattle, Portland, their hands strengthened by the support of many of the smaller in-between cities, ought to be able to support such an organization. Its headquarters could be in San Francisco, and its flying buttresses—in the shape of a traveling adjunct to the main company—could carry each pronounced local success up and down the Coast. There ought to be something in it.

True, the producer would need the prestige to make advantageous arrangements with the heads of New York theatres. And I do not overlook the presence of a stock company here at the Alcazar. But that house frankly makes its bid for a different line of custom from that that I am considering. It is, in fact, the class of people that go to the Maitland. The regular patrons of the Maitland and of the Players Theatre, and others who habitually patronize the big, expensive traveling organizations, but who would also go regularly to see plays done by good players, are really hungry for more first-class acting. They recognize that we can't have the best. The East is too powerful a magnet. But in a city of the size of San Francisco we ought to be able to support a really capable fixed stock company giving first-class plays.

This week Lea Penman appears as Mrs. Warren in Shaw's famous play. Gray hair and no paint to speak of play hob with Miss Penman's youth and freshness. There is no subtlety in her delineation of the still disreputable mother of Vivie, but considerable human nature. Dorothy Wetmore, in spite of some uncertainty in her lines—for Bernard Shaw is merciless in his exactions on the memories of players—got away from her too frequently dolorous note and conveyed the idea of Vivie's mannishness and logical hardness. William Guilbert appeared to better advantage than usual as Sir George Croft, and Sidney Riggs, Thomas Miller, and Walter Corey completed the cast. Mr. Riggs as that irreverent rattle, Frank Gardner, performing prodigies in the way of memorizing very difficult lines, even if his technic did give evidences of being young and tender.

POPULAR FICTION.

Everybody, more or less, reads fiction, and it is evident that since the new school of unromantic young men and women writers have emerged everybody wants somebody to take them by the hand, leading them out of their amazement, and sometimes bewilderment, and rising to explain.

So Professor Powys is having very attentive audiences. Tuesday he had a fistful of popular subjects: "Moon Calf," and its sequel, "The Briary Bush," "Main Street," "Miss Lulu Bett," and Willa Sibert Cather's "Song of the Lark."

Mr. Powys is a discerning critic. He goes right to the very soul of the books he considers. He gave an interesting impression of Willa Sibert Cather, whose withers would be wrung if she could hear his condemnation of the writer who is one with the country that she knows and loves going innocently and mistakenly to New York for copy. "Only the geniuses," says Powys, "dare to stay at home."

"Miss Lulu Bett"—the novel—he considers a work of genius, although the author's shrewdness and determination "to get it over" prevented her from attaining in that book to her full artistic stature. He points out—and we recognize its truthfulness—the curious mixture in Zona Gale of a cynically detached observation and a deep pity for such simple-minded, helpless beings—"eternal Cinderellas"—as Lulu Bett, who are born to be exploited by perfectly respectable people who yet are hard, malicious, and cruel. The world is full of them, but when they read of the cruelties of others they will never take it to themselves.

In a very just criticism on "Main Street" the professor pointed out that Sinclair Lewis is not a genius, "because a genius would never try to ridicule Main Street." In other words, he fails to recognize the real beauties in human nature. "The Sinclair Lewis culture is culture without humanity; which is no culture at all." And the critic further points his criticism by demanding why the ridiculer of Main Street never found a Lulu Bett in that bleak thoroughfare.

In considering "Moon Calf," the reviewer, who knows Floyd Dell, entered into a disquisition upon the character of the self-revealing author of that popular novel. He considers him a human butterfly, fleeing from the possessive instincts of woman; which certainly accords with the leading character of "The Moon Calf," whose autobiographical identity with the author we easily sense. Professor Powys, alluding to the photographic quality of the novel—and which, to my taste, deprives it of much of the charm it might otherwise possess—says that Floyd Dell, "that little imp," exploited numerous friends and acquaintances in the book. The professor, while admiring Dell as "a prismatic bubble," "a male Undine," was comfortably oblivious, apparently, of the brand new sets of morals—or omissions of them—which characterize the young man group to which Floyd Dell belongs. But really there isn't much to say. It is a characteristic of the times, the mental and moral independence of young men and women, and it will probably take two or three decades and the coming of a new generation to see how it is going to work out. Perhaps W. L. George, who, under Paul Elder's auspices, lectures here this week, may try to enlighten us.

THE GIBBS LECTURE.

Sir Philip Gibbs, one of the foremost correspondents of the war, friend and brother of soldiers in all ranks of life, and knighted for the services his sympathetic pen has given to humanity, has been a visitor to San Francisco this week, and, under Paul Elder's management, given two lectures to large and attentive audiences.

The English journalist's writings have revealed him as a man of profound sensibility, and his features, which are stamped by the pallor which too many of the survivors of the war carry with them as a heritage of the hardships of the trenches, bear out the testimony of his writings. Sir Philip's speech, as well as his features, is very English. Indeed, in commenting on the minor and "purely accidental" differences between the British and the American people, one of which, he said, lay in their accent, he related that once, while addressing an American audience, a voice called to him from the audience to "take the marbles out of his mouth."

In both lectures the speaker discussed the after effects of the war, dwelling more particularly in the first one on the changes in other countries, while in the second he discussed the effect it had had on the social life of Great Britain.

Old conditions, he told us, are passing. The county families can no longer maintain their feudal state because of the immensely high taxes. The country mansions are being denuded of their art treasures, which are sold, and the great estates listed for sale.

There is, he tells us, a revolution in English thoughts and minds, and the old, romantic England, of which Americans loved to read, will soon be gone.

England has lost its insularity since German shot and shell were aimed at its very heart from the Zeppelins during the war. Comradeship in the trenches made many English of the intellectual and patrician classes acquainted, for the first time, with the better qualities of the men of the slums. Caste barriers became weakened in consequence, when the more fortunate ones saw such fine soldiers emerge from those lowly ranks.

From the discussion of these changes the speaker passed to a consideration of the status of the workingman, who, during the era of high wages, had been able to purchase things that brought beauty and hope and joy into the family life. The subsequent unrest in the ranks of labor was due, said Sir Philip, to the workman's fear of a lowered standard of living to its former depressing level.

The lecturer, eventually departing from a discussion of social conditions, took up the subject of the disagreement between Great Britain and France concerning the restoration of German industry, and finally ended on a note of strong hopefulness in respect to the friendship between the two great English-speaking nations.

Sir Philip's face is turned hopefully toward the changes that have been brought about by the war, but the most humanly interesting part of his lecture was that in which, as a Briton, he could but be saddened in seeing the passing away of that picturesque England of which the great Victorians wrote. But even while, as a Briton, he felt some melancholy over its passing, as a humanitarian, he bails the coming of a new order of things in which the slum-dweller and the factory toiler will develop into a full-fledged human being.

THE COLOR ORGAN.

Mrs. Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, whose once popular books no doubt can be found lingering on the shelves of old-fashioned New England libraries, wrote in her time several stories about heaven—the subject obsessed her—and in one of them she described the simple enjoyments and pleasures of a homely, appealingly commonsensical heaven, most of them of an outdoor nature. But she imagined one indoor recreation which, it is not at all impossible, may have had something to do with the original mental suggestion of "the color organ."

Mr. Thomas Wilfred's "color organ" has been attracting the attention of volatile New York. The color organ throws a series of changing colors on a screen while music, which is selected because of its alleged harmony with the colors which simultaneously appear, completes the artistic effect.

Some of the music which is played by Mr. Wilfred is also composed by him. Furthermore he is, apparently, not only a creator of the idea, but of the organ itself.

It is a distinctly novel conception, and, as described by sympathetic spectators and auditors, it seems to have artistic possibilities. Artists, probably, have been greatly interested. The idea of evolving color combinations which are analogous to chords of music recalls the very radical ideas advanced about painting by Willard Huntington Wright in his book, "Modern Painting." Speaking of the theory of the Synchronists, who eliminated all representations of objects from the pictorial art, the author says, "Thus was brought about the final purification of painting. Form was entirely divorced from any realistic consideration: and color became an organic function." And he compares this evolution to music, "which passed through the same development from the imitation of natural sounds to harmonic abstraction."

It is perhaps pertinent to add that devoutness is by no means the universal attitude in respect to the color organ. Audiences have given evidences of being wearied by the length of the entertainment, the flow of color, whether or not attended by music, sometimes gets on frivolous nerves, and some commentators who give every evidence of being people of mind have voted the color organ a bore.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

The Columbia Theatre.

Miss Barrymore is coming to the Columbia Theatre, beginning Monday evening. She will be seen in "Déclassée," the play by Zoe Akins in which her success has become a fact of important theatrical history. From October of 1920 to June of last year New York crowded the Empire Theatre to witness Miss Barrymore's performance in Miss Akins' play. In "Déclassée" Miss Akins has fitted Miss Barrymore with one of the best rôles of her career. She is Lady Helen Haden, a young Englishwoman of aristocratic birth and environment to whom, through no fault of her own save an amusing recklessness, unhappy circumstances bring matrimonial disaster. Adrift from her accustomed surroundings, Lady Helen is seen next in New York, embarked upon a social career at once precarious and amusing. The centre of a gay group of unusual, inconsequential worldlings, and with happiness seemingly almost within her grasp, her adventures come to a close in a final note of gripping, pathetic tragedy.

The Frohman Company has surrounded Miss Barrymore with a capable group of players, including Edward Emery, Henry Daniell, Philip Lord, Cyril Delevanti, Charles Wellesly, Hubbard Kirkpatrick, Alfred Hesse, W. G. Leith, Edward Le Hay, Irby Marshall, Virginia Chauvenet, Jane West, Mary R. de Wolf, Gabrielle Ravine, Ina Niland, Estelle Thebaud, and others.

The Maitland Playhouse.

Another Shaw revival is to be offered next week, commencing Monday night, when George Bernard Shaw's well-known drama, "Man and Superman," comes to the Maitland for the entire week. Director Arthur Maitland produced "Man and Superman" two seasons ago at the Stockton Street house, and it proved the biggest hit of the year.

This revival has been urged by patrons of the Maitland and there is every reason to believe the success of two years ago will be repeated during the coming week. It is the old story of the pursuit of man by woman, done in the sarcastic vein of the noted Irish playwright. Followers of the Maitland have never been surfeited by the Shaw plays, and those who have never witnessed this drama have a treat in prospect.

"Mrs. Warren's Profession," the most widely discussed of all the Shaw plays, is doing a good business this week at the Stockton Street house.

John Drew's popular comedy success, "The Duke of Killcrankie," is in rehearsal at the Maitland, and "The Climax" is another play shortly to be revived.

The Orpheum.

Pat Rooney, one of the most imitated of eccentric dancers, with Marion Bent, is coming in a revue called "Rings of Smoke." A number of pretty girls and a jazz band are features of the elaborate revue written by Edgar Allen Woolf, Cliff Hess, Joseph Stanley, and Pat Rooney.

"In a Smile or Two" is offered by Lester Crawford and Helen Broderick. The ingredients are blended together to a nicety and served by an attractive girl and a pleasing young man.

Julia Nash has left the legitimate stage. She has given vaudeville, together with C. H. O'Donnell, a number of playlets mostly written by her clever co-star. This season "Almost Single" is her vehicle and this, like "Three G. M.," is from Mr. O'Donnell's pen. It is a humorous domestic sketch.

Joe Shriner and Billy Fitzsimmons have selected a corner news-stand as the scene for their comedy diversion entitled "The News-dealer." They represent him as an interesting type, with his fingers constantly on the public pulse.

Ann Grey recently returned from abroad, where she was on concert tour with her harp. She comes to America by way of the vaudeville stage.

Redford and Winchester are two very clever and eccentric jugglers. They are recognized as most skilful and at the same time most amusing.

Davis and Pelle are entitled to call their performance an equilibristic marathon. From the time they begin until they conclude their performance the topmount is in the air constantly.

"The Storn." will remain a second week. Next week is positively the final week of its appearance here.

Many interesting dramatic activities are frequently going on in Berkeley, but here in San Francisco we are oblivious of them, for, after all, we are two cities, each interested in our own affairs. The Greek Theatre Players are responsible for some of the most notable performances given in Berkeley by talented amateurs, and are really worthy of the attention of people here who feel a genuine interest in the drama. Last week they played at Wheeler Hall "The Lonely Way," a sequel written by Arthur Schnitzler, the famous Viennese author, to his "The Affairs of Ana-tol." This week it will be played again on March 4th and 5th. No doubt the establishment of a School of the Art of the Theatre under the direction of Messrs. Hume and Pischel has greatly stimulated interest in things of the drama in the university city. Which suggests an idea—why could not all these "little theatre" enterprises loosely organize in one and draw upon each other's resources in the line of talent, keeping finances separate. But no, they won't; any more than San Francisco and Oakland will.

Pope's Sistine Chapel Choir.

The Pope's Sistine Chapel Choir from the Vatican, Rome, is booked on the British P. & O. liner Maldora, sailing from Naples for Melbourne, Australia, where the choir will make its first appearance in history away from the European continent on Easter Sunday, April 15th. The Australian tour, which was recently booked by Thomas Quinlan of London, representing a group of influential music lovers and leading citizens of the important centres of the Antipodes, covers a period of eight weeks minimum and fourteen weeks maximum.

Manager Frank W. Healy of this city hopes that the wishes of Monsignor Antonio Rella, the conductor of the world-famous choir, to have the organization come to the principal cities of North and South America before returning to Rome will be gratified, and to insure this extension of their tour Healy is preparing a list of music lovers of this city who will guarantee twelve appearances on the Pacific Coast by the choir. Healy has been commissioned to submit such a list of guarantors to Rome for approval before the Sistine Choir departs for Australia on the 12th of March, and if the underwriting arrangements and personnel are satisfactory to the Vatican authorities it is believed that permission will be granted to have the choir come to the Pacific Coast upon completion of its Australian appearances.

The San Francisco Museum of Art Lectures.

The first of the series of lectures to be given in connection with the exhibitions of Japanese art now at the Palace of Fine Arts will be devoted to an interpretation of the art and symbolism of Japanese flower arrangements, which is one of the most interesting features of this unusual group of exhibitions. The lecture will be given by Mr. Torao Kawasaki, an authority on Japanese poetry and music, Friday, March 3d. These flower arrangements are all made with natural flowers and approximately cover the whole gamut of the art from the most informal to the most complicated decorations. Flower arrangement is a distinctive type of art by itself, as is the ceremonial tea in Japan.

To master the art is said to require years of patient study and practice, but to acquire its rudiments is not so difficult. Mr. Kawasaki will also show the relationship between this art and the art of painting, as exemplified in the collection of paintings by the group of artists known as the Nippon Bijutsu-in of Tokyo, whose pictures fill two galleries of the Oriental section, near the flower arrangements.

Tickets for these lectures, costing $1 for the course of six, or 25 cents for each individual lecture, may be obtained at the office of the Museum in the Palace of Fine Arts. Museum members are admitted free upon presentation of their membership cards. The lectures begin promptly at 2 o'clock.

Drive for the Boy Scouts.

The executive board of the Boy Scout organization will start a campaign on Monday next for funds to carry on their work during the coming year. The sum desired is $55,000. John A. McGregor is chairman of the campaign committee and Carl O. Dustin will direct the canvass. "In making up the budget," says the committee, "every item has been eliminated that was not absolutely essential to sustaining efficiency."

The Paul Elder Lectures.

"Love and Marriage" is the subject of a lecture to be given Monday evening in the Colonial Ballroom, Hotel St. Francis, by the English novelist, W. L. George. His last lecture in San Francisco will be a study of Anatole France. At this lecture (Wednesday evening, March 8th) he will be introduced by George Douglas. These lectures are given under the management of Paul Elder.

One hundred years ago, or, more exactly, on December 8, 1821, the Journal Débats published the following item: "There is now much talk in Milan of an invention for which the author, a certain Cataneo, has just got a license from the Emperor of Austria. Several times already they have tried in England and France to make a carriage move without horses, but every time it was observed that the mechanism gave rise to insuperable difficulties. Mr. Cataneo not only dispenses with the team, but by means of his mechanism one single horse keeps up and accelerates the movement to a point at which he does easily the work of four horses."

John Cowper Powys.

Lecturing on the works of recent important modern writers, John Cowper Powys will this Friday discuss "Cytherea," by Hergesheimer, and "Jurgen," by James Branch Cabell. Tuesday next his subjects will be "Eric Dorn," by Ben Hecht, and "The World's Illusion," by Wasserman.

Powys, whose lectures take place at the Maitland Theatre under the management of Jessica Colbert, also gives popular Sunday evening talks, and will have as a theme this coming Sunday, "The Problem of Crime." Powys will discuss this subject, not in a general sense; but specifically, touching upon the crimes of sex, psycho-analysis, the unemployed, and various other points, and the effect upon the world today of this criminal impulse in different directions.

Woman in Finland enjoys almost equal rights with the man. In school she has, in the common instruction with the male youth, opportunity to contend with them and to acquire the same knowledge. After completing the school education almost all vocations are open to her, and she is found in all branches of industry, but especially in business houses, in public offices, and similar institutions. She can not occupy the office of minister, however, and some high appointive posts. Practically, woman is the equal of man. She has the right of suffrage and she herself is eligible to all elective offices. The Finnish Diet actually counts twenty female deputies among its members.

The proverbial phrase, "to face the music," is probably derived from the stage, where it was used by actors in the greenroom when preparing to go on the boards.

VANITY FAIR.

Popular interest has centered even more feverishly on the engagement or potential engagement of America's greatest heiress than it has on Princess Mary's own. And a few short weeks ago, in fact before Mathilde's romantic bomb had burst into the headlines of our hectic press, one would have thought it impossible for another engagement to hold a candle to the limelight of publicity that blazes about the minutest details of Mary's nuptials. However, America has broken the British record. Whereas the princess' affair partakes of a private, albeit highly ceremonious, nature and is at its most redundant phase still brilliantly tinted with British local color, Miss Mathilde's has become an international episode. The princess had a good running start on our heiress, but despite her momentum, Mathilde can fairly be said to have caught up with her in the flagging of public attention. In fact, the greatest attention to the princess' betrothal has been centered on her trousseau and her gifts, her sport costumes and her linen chests. Nothing so prosaic has been featured in the American-Swiss romance. And yet, strange to say, there are several analogies between the two affairs. Both were founded on a friendship founded on the sport of horsemanship. Oser is, according to some reports, of noble birth, and by all reports of a fine old Swiss family. Like the royal consort, he is of the interesting age of forty. In view of the fact that so much comment has been made on the age of Miss Mathilde's choice, it seems almost invidious to draw the comparison. But in the interests of free speech we do ask the question—why is forty all right for the viscount and all wrong for the Swiss cavalryman? The matter is swathed in mystery. We trust we are not committing a grave diplomatic breach. However, the McCormick-Oser affair has reached such international proportions that any discussion of it borders on the nature of diplomacy. There is still one thing that can be done to cut the Gordian knot of our international intrigue. It does not smack of the camera stellata and its method would be somewhat new in diplomatic usage. Still in extreme cases extreme measures must be adopted. Now that practically every one in the English and we presume in the French, German, and Italian (i. e., Swiss) speaking world has had time thoroughly to master the details of the proposed alliance, we suggest that a referendum be taken and that Miss Mathilde, as a good American or a prospective good Swiss citizen, abide by the decision of the people. It seems to be their affair fully as much as it hers.

Paris, the home of Western logic, has reversed the epitome of its old wisdom, and adopted the slogan cherchez l'homme. It was like the Gallic temperament to come straight to the point. It would have been very un-French to dodge the issue. In the happy past of France woman figured largely. Today she is a drug on the market. She is not far to seek. In fact France is said to be sobered to the point of having practically renounced romance. Poor France! Can she still be French? England is in the giddy throes of pleasure-seeking, but pleasure and catastrophe are incompatible to the straight-hewed Gallic mind. What the war really has done is to reveal the inherent logic of the French mind. In the days of uxorious peace woman was the raison d'être of the gallant Gaul's existence. Now in the all too polygamous aftermath of the war she has ceased to have a reason for existing herself. The national mind of France swings straight to the point, cherchez l'homme. Not perhaps quite in the old sense. Even a Frenchman would hardly admit that man could be at the bottom of any mischief. But find him anyway. The symptom of the reversed philosophy of France is the new rage of featuring masculine beauty in the theatre. Where once half of Paris turned out to see lovely woman clad in pearls and a ribbon or two, now at least three-fourths of Paris turns out to see glorious man à la Adam. Nor is this merely a new manifestation of French theatrical depravity. It is the French genius for candid logic.

On the principle that misery loves company we found it very refreshing to read in a recent Manchester Guardian Lucio's, that delectable versifier's, reaction to the social status quo. Lucio, we infer, like the rest of us, sighs for the good old days when hospitality existed. His present wail is on the decadent though inexorable custom of requesting guests to "bring something for supper." Alas! for Max Beerbohm's division of the human race into hosts and guests. The host along with other professional classes is automatically deprived of his job in these times. Lucky for Max himself that he found his own category among the guests. And lucky the rest of us who can gracefully forego the privileges of hosting. What the new race must needs develop is a composite creature half guest, half host, who reck nothing at all of bringing his supper and "likewise a well-appointed flask." England is not as yet suffering under the odium of prohibition, but the income tax seems to have had a similar effect on convivial parties. And a touch of deprivation makes the whole world kin. We are all in the same leak-proof boat. Which reminds one that when Mr. Balfour was asked what he thought of prohibition he replied: "America will be very dull when it begins."

STORYETTES.
Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

A negro charged with stealing a watch had been arraigned before the court. The judge was not convinced that he was guilty and said: "You are acquitted, Sam." "Acquitted," repeated Sam doubtfully. "What do you mean, judge?" "That's the sentence; you are acquitted." Still looking somewhat confused, Sam said: "Judge, does dat mean I have to give the watch back?"

An old dorky got up one night at a revival meeting and said: "Brudders an' sisters, you knows an' I knows dat I aint been what I oughter been. Ise robbed hen roosts and stole hawgs, an' tole lies, an' got drunk an' slashed folks wi' mah razor, an' shot craps, an' cussed an' swore; but I thank the Lord der's one thing I aint nebber done; I aint nebber lost mah religion."

Anatole France, who is seventy-eight, went to Stockholm to receive his Nobel Prize just after recovering from a severe illness. He was fearful of catching cold, and wore several well-padded waistcoats under his coat. The Swedish custom officers were suspicious. "What have you got in here?" one of them asked, with his hands on the great novelist's coat. "France," was the reply.

Johnnie, aged six, was missed by his mother one day for some time, and when he reappeared she asked: "Where have you been, my son?" "Playing postman," replied Willie. "I gave a letter to all the houses in our street. Really, truly letters, too." "Where on earth did you get them?" questioned his mother in amazement. "They were those old ones in your bureau drawer, tied up with ribbon," was the innocent reply.

"Eamonn de Valera, whatever his shortcomings as a statesman, is surely gifted with wit," said a member of the Clan Na Gael in Philadelphia. "Once at a supper at my house the talk turned to Irish bulls. 'Define an Irish bull,' a young lady says to Valera. Quick as a flash Valera comes back at her with: 'Suppose there are thirteen cows lying down in a field, and one of them is standing up—that would be a bull.'"

The young wife entered the kitchen rather nervously, and, after hesitating for a few seconds, said to the cook: "Oh, cook, I must really speak to you. Your master is always complaining. One day it is the soup, and the next day it is the fish, and the third day it is the roast, in fact, it's always something or other." The cook replied with feeling, "Well, mum, I'm sorry for you. It must be awful to live with a gentleman like that."

Cuthbert had been listening for half an hour to a lecture from his father on the evils of late nights and late risings in the morning. "You will never amount to anything" said the father, "unless you turn over a new leaf. Remember, it's the early bird that catches the worm." "Ha, ha!" laughed Cuthbert. "How about the worm? What did he get for turning out so early?" "My son," replied the father, "that worm hadn't been to bed all night; he was on his way home."

Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, congratulated on the marvelous success of his recent foreign tour, said with a smile: "We can all get on with foreigners, you know, if we will remember not to criticize. A foreigner's country is to him what your family is to you. You will criticize it yourself, but criticism from the outside you can't and won't abide. An American said to an Englishman one day: 'London's a dull hole.' 'As an Englishman,' said the other, 'I object to that remark. I agree with it, but I object to it.'"

Stephen Leacock, during his recent lecture tour abroad, appeared at a popular seaside resort on the southern coast of England. The hall was a large one, but the audience was conspicuously small. Mr. Leacock thus began his address: "It has been forty-three years since my last appearance in B—; neither the sea nor the sky seems quite as blue as I remember them, but I am quite sure, judging by the size of the audience tonight, that the population of the city has shrunk at least one-third."

Pierce Van Vleck, the Baltimore financier, said at a dinner party: "Keeping a husband in hot water will never make him tender. Ignorance of this primary truth causes a lot of divorces. A Baltimorean got on a trolley-car the other day in anything but a tender mood. His wife, because he could not afford her an $800 set of Siberian rat, had snatched the morning paper out of his hand, called him a shiftless, knock-kneed failure, and thrown his freshly-opened package of cigarettes into the stove. So this man, his mood not at all tender, got on the car and took a seat beside

Bleat if I Know.
We two had a row
Somehow!
Perhaps she was fretful, and I didn't care,
Or, perhaps, I did something she couldn't bear.
Or, perhaps, a depression advanced in the air,
But, however that may be, the disturbance was there,
And a storm began to brew,
At first it muttered,
And hard words were uttered,
Then harder and harder until things grew
Supremely unpleasant for each of us two,
And I came to think
We had reached the brink
Of the grave of a friendship, whose loss we should rue,
So I begged her pardon—what less could I do?
She declared she was wrong—I hope it was true—
And the tempest's frown
Smoothed slowly down,
And it rumbled and sighed,
And whispered and died Away,
Yet all I can say
To this very day
Is we two had a row.

St. Margaret's.
St. Margaret's, in Westminster, London, has, under the auspices of the Sulgrave Manor Society, assumed quite an importance in the sight-seeing parties made up of Americans. Hitherto if the varied visitor had time for the vast abbey he was considered in luck, but now he divides his moments between the two historic churches. In St. Margaret's that prince of courtiers, Sir Walter Raleigh, was buried, and under the memorial window erected by American subscription to this pioneer of the Western world and to his half brother, Sir Humphrey Gilbert, is the familiar verse composed by James Russell Lowell at the dedication. John Milton was married in St. Margaret's and George W. Childs contributed a window in commemoration of this, and John Greenleaf Whittier composed the stanza which adorns it. Oliver Wendell Holmes wrote the verse which marks the tomb of his friend, Cyril Lytton Farrar, a son of Archdeacon Farrar, who was for so long the rector of St. Margaret's. For all these reasons the society engaged in promoting good will and friendship between the English-speaking races deems it as important for tourists to visit this smaller church as the adjacent abbey. Another reason might be that the wife of the present rector is that Mary Endicott who married Joseph Chamberlain and, on his death, the Rev. William Hartley Carnegie, a canon of Westminster and the rector of the parish church of the British Parliament and its honorary chaplain.

Five-hundred-ruble notes are no longer legal tender in Moscow. A recent decree of the Moscow Soviet announces that hereafter street railways and other government institutions will accept nothing less than thousand-ruble notes. A thousand-ruble note is worth half an American cent at the present legal rate of exchange. At the old par of Russian exchange a thousand-ruble note would be worth $515.

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

CYCOL will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Persia Greets Ireland.

The Irish Free State already has secured international recognition (says the New York Tribune). Routine of the provisional government's work was broken when, complete with fez on head and scimitar at side, a representative of the Shah of Persia visited the City Hall, where the government is at present established. He came to offer to Arthur Griffith, as president of the Dail, and to Michael Collins, as head of the provisional government, flowery congratulations on this "glorious epoch in Irish history," coupled with the hope that Ireland may be "one of the happiest and most progressive countries of the world."

Griffith and Collins in their replies said that they were very much touched by the message from such an ancient and famous nation, and hoped that the future would afford many opportunities for the two nations to help each other. It looks an empty compliment, but Ireland and Persia are not so very far apart after all.

They say, dear Moore, your lays are sung—
Can it be true, you lucky man?—
By moonlight in the Persian tongue
Along the streets of Ispahan.

sang the Irish poet Luttrell to Tom Moore, recalling his associations with the East. And the most famous rendering of Omar Khayyam into English was by the Irishman Edward Fitzgerald. A translation of Omar into Irish was published last year by Professor O'Donoghue of University College, Cork. It only remains to add that Anglo-Persian oil shares stand at a premium on the Dublin Stock Exchange.

Proverbial Foolishness.

Dr. Millicent Mortimer Miller, president of the Denver Birth Control League, said at a luncheon:

"Proverbs are supposed to be wise, but they are really foolish. Look at the proverbs, for example, concerning woman. Why, they make woman out to be the worst scoundrel unhung. 'You know the old English proverb,

A woman, a dog, a walnut tree,
The more you beat them, the better they be.

"There's a gallant proverb for you! I don't understand the part about the walnut tree, but the part about dogs and women is quite clear enough.

"The chivalrous Spanish have a proverb running

Were a woman as little as she is good,
A pea pod would make her a gown and a hood.

"The Germans say, 'There are only two good women in the world—one is dead, and the other can't be found.'

"Persia has a fine proverb. It is, 'Women and dragons are best out of the world.'

"The Corsicans, Hindus, and Russians are united in their advocacy of woman-beating—or, at least, their proverbs make you think so.

"The Corsicans say, 'As good and bad horses both need the spur, so good and bad women both need the whip.' The Hindus say, 'A husband is neither obeyed nor loved by his wife unless he beats her.' And the Russians say, 'Drive out woman's wickedness with the knout, and do it daily, lest wickedness return.'"

That John Gay was a poet who did not let his genius interfere with his comfort one deduces from seeing the remarkable chair in which he wrote "The Beggar's Opera." Although two hundred years old, this chair is still in good condition and combines many clever devices which might be recommended to modern poets. It is of mahogany with stuffed seat, back, and arms covered with brown leather and studded with brass nails. Under each arm is a shaped receptacle for writing materials. These are pivoted and swing on metal pins bolted to the arms. The right-hand tray is nicely divided into various shapes for different articles, such as ink bottles and pens. From the left arm projects an adjustable candlestick. When not in use these trays can be swung back under the arms of the chair. Under the seat is a drawer for holding manuscripts and at the back a secret drawer in which were discovered several unpublished poems. If the jolly eighteenth-century wit could have seen the vivid, whimsical setting which the young English artist, Lovat Frazer, gave the revival of his famous opera last year in London and the equally beautiful edition of the book designed and illustrated by Mr. Frazer which Doubleday, Page & Co. have published in this country, he would have been amazed and gratified.

In the environs of Falun, in the north of Sweden, is what is held to be the oldest operated mine in the world. As early as 1225 copper began to be extracted from it. In the seventeenth century the mine constituted the principal source of copper of Europe. Today it no longer produces the same quantities, but in its deep shafts and galleries are found pyrites of sulphur, which are used for the manufacture of sulphuric acid and other chemical products. It is the least modern mine imaginable, for it is lacking elevators or even buckets and windlass for the workman to descend and ascend. For this purpose they use sloping galleries and long ladders. The walls of the mine are always covered with ice. Drainage and ventilation are obtained by means of a wheel pump, the like of which is seen nowhere else. Besides copper and pyrites the mine produces a little gold. The claim is made in Sweden that the gold for the crown and sceptre of the king was extracted from the Falun mine.

Old Manuscript.

The sky is that beautiful old parchment in which the sun and the moon
keep their diary.
To read it all,
one must become a linguist more learned than Father Wisdom; and a visionary
more clairvoyant than Mother Dream.
But to feel it,
one must be an apostle:
one who is more than intimate in having been, always, the only confidant—
like the earth or the sea.

—Alfred Kreymborg.

Road-Song of the Bandar Log.

Here we go in a flung festoon,
Half-way up to the jealous moon!
Don't you envy our princely bands?
Don't you wish you had extra hands?
Wouldn't you like if your tails were—so—
Curved in the shape of a Cupid's bow?
Now you're angry, but—never mind,
Brother, thy tail hangs down behind!

Here we sit in a branchy row,
Thinking of beautiful things we know;
Dreaming of deeds that we mean to do,
All complete, in a minute or two—
Something noble and grand and good,
Won by merely wishing we could.
Now we're going to—never mind,
Brother, thy tail hangs down behind!

All the talk we ever have heard
Uttered by bat or beast or bird—
Hide or fin or scale or feather—
Jabber it quickly and all together!
Excellent! Wonderful! Once again!
Now we are talking just like men.
Let's pretend we are . . . never mind,
Brother, thy tail hangs down behind!
This is the way of the Monkey-kind.

Then join our leaping lines that scumfish through the pines,
That rocket by where, light and high, the wild-grape swings.
By the rubbish in our wake, and the noble noise
we make,
Be sure, be sure, we're going to do some splendid things!

—Rudyard Kipling.

The Field of Glory.

War shook the land where Levi dwelt,
And fired the dismal wrath he felt,
That such a doom was ever wrought
As his, to toil while others fought;
To toil, to dream—and still to dream,
With one day barren as another;
To consummate, as it would seem,
The dry despair of his old mother.

Far off one afternoon began
The sound of man destroying man;
And Levi, sick with nameless rage,
Condemned again his heritage,
And sighed for scars that might have come,
And would, if once he could have sundered
Those harsh, inhering claims of home
That held him while he cursed and wondered.

Another day, and then there came,
Rough, bloody, ribald, hungry, lame,
But yet themselves, to Levi's door,
Two remnants of the day before.
They laughed at him and what he sought;
They jeered him, and his painful acre;
But Levi knew that they had fought,
And left their manners to their Maker.

That night, for the grim widow's ears,
With hopes that hid themselves in fears,
He told of arms, and fiery deeds,
Whereat one leaps the while he reads,
And said he'd be no more a clown,
While others drew the breath of battle.—
The mother looked him up and down,
And laughed—a scant laugh with a rattle.

She told him what she found to tell,
And Levi listened, and heard well
Some admonitions of a voice
That left him no cause to rejoice.—
He sought a friend, and found the stars,
And prayed aloud that they should aid him;
But they said not a word of wars,
Or of a reason why God made him.

And who's of this or that estate
We do not wholly calculate,
When baffling shades that shift and cling
Are not without their glimmering;
When even Levi, tired of faith,
Beloved of none, forgot by many,
Dismissed as an inferior wraith,
Reborn may be as great as any.

—From "Collected Poems of Edwin Arlington Robinson."

Clay Hills.

It is easy to mould the yielding clay.
And many shapes grow into beauty
Under the facile hand.
But forms of clay are lightly broken;
They will lie shattered and forgotten in a dingy corner.

But underneath the slipping clay
Is rock. . . .
I would rather work in stubborn rock
All the years of my life,
And make one strong thing
And set it in a high, clean place,
To recall the granite strength of my desire.

—Jean Starr Untermeyer.

Pearls.

For centuries the Chinese have acted upon the knowledge that a pearl is a disease of the oyster, but so far they have been able to produce nothing but mother of pearl. An English scientist is experimenting now on one of the Poumotu Islands, the most famous pearl fisheries of the world. In "The Cruise of the Dream Ship" Ralph Stock describes what has been accomplished so far in these experiments. He takes an oyster from the lagoon, opens it carefully by the slow insertion of a wooden wedge, and places a pilule of beeswax against the main muscle. The mantle of the oyster then covers it with mother-of-pearl and in the course of a few months there forms a blister, or a fair imitation of a half-pearl. But the real pearl comes from the flesh of the oyster, and in order to produce a genuine pearl the scientist breeds oysters on the lagoon, dissects them under the microscope for signs of the parasite that undoubtedly causes the pearl, and injects into their flesh all manner of foreign matter.

Men who want the submarine retained in an honorable service would be horror-struck if any one charged them with approving of the dum dum bullet or any other instrument or practice in warfare prohibited by a Hague convention (says the New York Times). If the submarine were blacklisted tomorrow by the Disarmament Conference, it would not have a defender left. Everybody would anathematize it because of the use the Germans made of it during the war. The long list of the ships they sank in wanton disregard of the humane interdictions of international law—helpless merchantmen, liners carrying innocent women and children, and even hospital ships, marked, lighted, and flagged for immunity from attack even by the Germans—should be read at the conference when the submarine is discussed, followed by Mr. Balfour's prediction, made before the Chamber of Commerce in this city after the war, that if there were another conflict between nations "the least scrupulous of the belligerents" would behave as Germany did, "and the commerce of the whole civilized world would be disorganized and destroyed." No case can be made out for the use of the submarine against merchantmen—and it would always be employed to raid the enemy's trading ships—without violation of the humanities imposed by international law, no matter how excellent are the intentions of the nation that commissions them. If merchant ships were to be made immune, as hospital ships are supposed to be, there might be an honorable place in a fleet for a submarine, theoretically at least, but war will never be waged against warcraft only. The world wants the submarine abolished. The conference can do nothing that will win it more applause.

An exhibition of modern French arts and crafts is just now closing in Tokyo. The Japanese have been buying European art in large quantities and important examples during the past two years. A recently founded society of 100 painters in Berlin has received an invitation to take part in the large general exhibition to be held in Tokyo next April with a special exhibition of their own work.
